DEAN'S DESK

Licensing, Jobs and Masters Degrees

Most of these pieces have a greater degree of coherence than this one is likely to possess. The reason is a relatively simple one. I would like to say some things about several topics of interest and concern to the College of Law which have at best a tangential relationship to each other. So don't let the title mislead you, though I intend to spend considerably more time on the first than the other two items.

Changes in the Ohio Bar Examination

First, let me fill you in on developments relating to the Ohio bar examination. About two years ago Chief Justice Thomas J. Moyer appointed an ad hoc Bar Examination Review Committee, chaired by Justice Herbert R. Brown.

That committee was charged with analyzing all aspects of the preparation, administration and grading of the Ohio bar examination, and was asked to make recommendations for improvements to Ohio's lawyer licensing process to the Supreme Court. The committee submitted its report to the Court in December of 1990. The report is a thorough and thoughtful one, in my judgment, and the recommendations it contains are responsive to a number of concerns that I, along with others, have had about the bar examination process for some time.

Essentially, the Brown committee report recommends that the Ohio bar examination continue to utilize both essay questions (for two days) and multiple-choice questions (for one day—basically, the so-called "multistate bar examination," or MBE). However, it also recommends that "essay answers be weighed twice as heavily as MBE performance," and that "the Board [of Bar Examiners] return to grading all essays for all applicants." [Emphasis added.] Presently, only 4 of the 24 essay answers are graded for applicants who score in the upper 60 percent on the MBE. This has been a matter of considerable consternation for some time, and, as the committee states, "raises questions about the [bar] examination's fairness or, at least, the perception of fairness." For those of us who feel that the MBE largely tests test-taking ability, the disproportionate influence of the MBE has been, and remains, of serious concern. I applaud this pivotal recommendation and have urged the Court to adopt and implement it for the July 1991 bar examination.

Several recommendations associated with a return to grading all essay-question answers are also included in the Brown committee report.

One involves the "scaling" of the scores of essay answers—to performance on the MBE for the particular examination—in order to "ensure consistency in measuring applicant essay performance across examinations." This is already being done by the vast majority of other

States and is a sound and sensible step, I believe, that will be effective in dealing with unevenness

(some might say arbitrariness) in grading essay answers. In addition, since all essay-question answers would now be graded, the committee also recommends that "graders" be employed to assist bar examiners in this demanding task. And an internship year is suggested for all bar examiners, as well as "request[ing] Ohio law schools to conduct annual training sessions for all bar examiners," something I have notified Chief Justice Moyer that Ohio State would be pleased to do. The committee further recommends that the "model answers" prepared by bar examiners be submitted to the faculties of Ohio law schools for "review and comment" after the administration, but prior to the grading, of essay-question answers. I regard this as a salutary suggestion, not simply because it would involve law faculties in the process, but, more importantly, because it would add a rather simple step (again, used by other States) to ensure the correctness of the model answers used in grading essay questions.

Finally, under the rubric of "due process issues," the committee recommends "an automatic regrade of essays [answers] written by applicants who fail [a bar] examination by 2 points or less"—so-called "marginal failures." Lastly, the committee endorses the "expan[sion of] applicant access to examination materials [questions, model answers, and scores] following release of the [bar] exam results." I support these recommendations as well, and agree with the committee's conclusion that they would enhance fairness and credibility, along with assisting "failing applicants in identifying their deficiencies and preparing for reexamination," while stopping short of the burdensome process of an administrative appeal for every applicant who does not obtain a passing score.

One might question the overall importance of these recommendations, and, more generally, of proposed changes in the bar examination process. Stated differently, don't they involve matters that bar examiners and legal educators are uniquely interested in? I don't believe so, for several reasons. First, it is the responsibility of all of us with various roles in the legal profession to attempt to ensure that the process by which new lawyers are licensed is principled, fair and effective. Otherwise, we disserve members of the public who place their lives, liberty and property in the hands of lawyers who represent them. Moreover, if we cannot be confident about the fairness and efficacy of the process used to license our own, can we credibly challenge similar processes in our capacity as lawyers?

The still-recent bloodshed resulting from the July 1990 bar examination underscores this point. The overall pass rate dropped 23 percentage points, from 88 to 65, largely because one or several new bar examiners determined to give very low scores to some of the essay answers they graded. The pass rate of Ohio State graduates once again led the State, with an 88 percent overall rate, but that is small consolation to our graduates who did not pass and certainly of limited interest to the hundreds of other applicants from other law schools who were notified that they had failed. The close association in timing between the July 1990 bar examination results and the submission of the Brown committee report was, I am sure, coincidental. But it was also quite fortuitous. The Ohio Supreme Court has already acted to implement the committee recommendations relating to "scaling" the grading of essay-question answers and the addition of "graders" to assist the bar examiners. We thus seem to be on the proper road, I believe, toward correcting most of the deficiencies of the present process, and to improving the Ohio bar examination in significant and needed respects. I have notified the Chief Justice that I agree with and support all of the Brown committee's recommendations, and concur with the Chief Justice that their adoption will result in "substantial improvements in the preparation, administration and grading of the Ohio bar examination."

My remaining uneasiness on this issue relates to the Brown committee's apparent failure to address the pros and cons of including "skills testing" as part of the Ohio bar examination. What I told Chief Justice Moyer is as follows:

"The skills testing [that] other States are increasingly engaging in relates to several basic lawyering skills that, I believe, we should seek to ensure a newly trained lawyer possesses, in addition to those tested by essay questions on substantive legal topics. These include fact gathering, interviewing, counseling, negotiation and mediation, drafting, and planning in the legal context. . . . The most important aspect of skills testing may [well] be the message it conveys to applicants and the law schools they attend [and, I might have added, to the public]—that basic lawyering skills are a respected and expected component of a new lawyer's arsenal of abilities. [Since] large numbers of newly licensed lawyers do not go into practice situations where they are supervised with any degree of thoroughness, [a]ll of us have a public responsibility, I believe, to seek to ensure that they not only know the law, but can act [competently] on behalf of clients in practicing law."

I urged the Court to accept and implement the committee's report, so far as it goes, for the July 1991 bar examination, but, at the same time, request the committee to reconvene to address the pros and cons of including a skills testing component in future Ohio bar examinations.

However one feels about the Brown committee's recommendations and my concerns about the omission of skills testing, I hope that this discussion has informed and perhaps stimulated some thinking about this matter by you, our alumni. Few things we do in the legal profession are more important than determining who will be licensed to practice law. At a time when many are understandably concerned about professionalism among lawyers, it is unprofessional, in my judgment, for us not to attempt to ensure that the lawyer licensing process is as fair and effective as we can make it. I hope that the Supreme Court moves expeditiously to adopt and implement the Brown committee's recommendations, as well as to ask that group to address the question of skills testing. This is a watershed time on this issue unlikely to recur for a decade or more. Let's get it "right" this time.

An LL.M. Program

Last December our faculty overwhelmingly approved a committee recommendation for establishment of a masters degree program in the College of Law. The specific focus of this new LL.M. program will be the law of banking, insurance and financial institutions. When fully developed and operative in 1993 or 1994, the program will enable us to achieve further distinction, grounded on focused expertise, in these important legal areas, ones of great significance today and in the future—to Ohio, and nationally and internationally. We hope as well to create a new Center for Law and Finance, to operate in conjunction with the masters degree program and to be housed in space made available by our $16.5 million building addition and renovation—construction of which is now underway. I invite your comments and suggestions on this endeavor and, more generally, on anything relating to legal education and the College of Law.

Placement Concerns

In closing, let me mention another matter alluded to at the outset. Not surprisingly, the downturn in the economy is adversely affecting our third-year students' job-hunting efforts, and the employment prospects of law students around the country. Whatever assistance any of our alums might provide to them, directly or through our Placement Office, would be greatly appreciated. More generally, so long as Ohio State continues to receive 2,000 or so applications a year, it will be very difficult for us, as a public law school, to reduce our enrollment. Alumni help in dealing with a tight job market is thus likely to be a continuing need, at least for the next few years.

Stay in touch as we move closer to celebration of the law school's centennial in 1991-1992. Best wishes to all for a very happy 1991.

Groundbreaking Held October 6

Glorious weather added the perfect colorful touch to the October 6 Groundbreaking Ceremony for the over 95,000 square foot College of Law Building Addition and Renovation Project scheduled to begin in early 1991. A stellar cast of distinguished guests joined Dean Francis X. Beytagh to celebrate the successful Centennial Campaign and the many cooperative efforts which have made this project possible.

The actual groundbreaking was preceded by a series of brief remarks in the Law Auditorium. Joining Dean Beytagh were E. Gordon Gee, OSU President, Thomas E. Cavendish '53, Centennial Campaign Co-Chair, Hon. Paul E. Pfeifer '66, Ohio Senator, Hon. Thomas J. Moyer '64, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ohio, Gerald L. Draper, Ohio State Bar Association President, Jessica K. Shimberg, LIII, Student Bar Association President, and project architects Kenneth Rohlfing and Bernard J. Costantino, representing Gunnar Birkerts & Associates of Birmingham, Michigan, and Bohm-NBBJ of Columbus, respectively.

Special guest Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong was introduced and received a sustained ovation for his leadership role during the 1950s when the present building was planned and constructed. Dean Beytagh also acknowledged many special guests from the University, The Ohio State University Board of Trustees, Ohio Board of Regents, Ohio Legislature, the judiciary, the organized bar, and other law schools. He gave particular thanks to those whose support was vital to the success of the project, including the Centennial Campaign Committee, special benefactors and members of the Henry Folsom Page Society, the University administration, and the Ohio General Assembly.

Upon completion of the formal ceremony, the crowd of well over 250 law school alumni, friends, faculty, staff, and students moved outside to witness the historic groundbreaking moment. Dean Beytagh, outfitted in an appropriate scarlet hard hat, turned the first shovelful of dirt amid much applause. He shared this important occasion with President Gee, Dean Emeritus Strong, OSU Board of Trustees Chair Shirley Dunlap Bowser, Ohio Senate President Stanley J. Aronoff, Ohio Board of Regents Vice Chair Anita S. Ward, Thomas E. Cavendish, National Council Chair Robert M. Duncan '52, and Faculty Planning Building Committee Chair Howard P. Fink.

Following the ceremonies, everyone enjoyed a beautiful luncheon on the lawn. The occasion was marked by festive balloons and other special mementos. A background of OSU music prepared the guests for the afternoon Big Ten opener with the Fighting Illini.

Law Building Design for the 21st Century

Preceding the late afternoon football game, a program entitled "Law Building Design for the 21st Century" was presented. Together with Dean Beytagh, Dean N. William Hines, University of Iowa Law School, Library Director Robert L. Oakley, Georgetown University Law School, and Kenneth Rohlfing, Gunnar Birkerts & Associates, the design architects for the building addition and renovation project, provided their insights into the process of designing a building that will be adequate for, at a minimum, the next quarter century.

Dean N. William Hines, University of Iowa, makes remarks to the crowd on "Law Building Design for the 21st Century."

"In designing a building addition expected to meet the space needs of the law school for the next fifty years, it is important to think ahead and try to anticipate how the process of legal education might change over the life of the new structure. The question of what legal education will be like in the 21st century is very much on the minds of many observers today, and there is no consensus among the predictions," stated Dean Hines. Indeed, that is the dilemma with which Dean Beytagh and the Faculty Planning Building Committee have wrestled from the beginning.

The following are excerpts of the remarks prior to the Groundbreaking Ceremony.

Dean Francis X. Beytagh

Dean Beytagh

We gather today on a brilliant early fall day in Central Ohio in this fine law school's 100th year to celebrate a milestone in its history. By breaking ground on a major addition to and substantial renovation of the existing law building, we cast a vote of confidence, we feel, in the future—the future not only of this law school and of the University, but the future, we hope, of our legal system (with all of its problems) and of the role of law in a free society.

What we are doing today has been made possible by a unique partnership of private philanthropy and public funding. The enlarged and modernized facility that we hope to dedicate in the fall of 1992...will house this law school and its people and programs for the next quarter century or so—long into the 21st century. I...am, our faculty, staff and students are, deeply grateful for the support we have received from alumni and friends in our Centennial Campaign and also from the Ohio General Assembly. It is our challenge, indeed our obligation, to design, build and use this facility well, and to do so in the public interest.

President E. Gordon Gee

President Gee

As a former law school dean, I know how much this means to the faculty and students of the College of Law. Certainly, those who have been here realize and value the quality of this great institution. And those who will now come through our doors will be able to see the work of those in the past and understand and value what our future is going to be.

More importantly, let me say how very much this means to The Ohio State University family. This building signals a growth not only in facilities but also a recognition of what we in legal education, and I know that Dean Hines and others in legal education join me in saying this, have long recognized—that this institution is one of America's great public university law schools, and the stature of this fine law school is now being recognized in a sense of the quality of its facilities.

This expansion also reflects another very high value... and that is the importance that we at this university put on a teaching/learning laboratory called a library. Only by providing outstanding resources can we expect extraordinary scholarship. And only with scholarship can we expect an extraordinary future.

Thomas E. Cavendish

"Time and change will surely show, How firm thy friendship, OHIO!" The words of Carmen, Ohio speak loudly to all of us today and were used in the printed invitation for this auspicious occasion. The project has, over time, changed quite a bit. Seven years ago, we envisioned a comparatively modest $7 million addition to the library to alleviate overcrowding and permit the growth of a very valuable legal resource for the University and the State of Ohio. Today we break ground for a much grander and far better solution to the space needs of the law school for the next generation.

During an early meeting of the Centennial Campaign Committee, one of our members, Stanley Schwartz [Jr., '47], succinctly stated what our goal should be: "A first-class home for a first-class law school." That was our ambition.

Dean Beytagh expertly put together a partnership of support for this ambitious goal. Commitments from the University, the State of Ohio, and the alumni and friends of the College of Law have made it possible for us to begin building the first-class home. Over the years we have evolved into a first-class law school through the efforts of thousands of people who have come before us. We enjoy a rich heritage, a proud tradition, and a promising future.

Thomas E. Cavendish '53

The Law Centennial Campaign has changed this law school forever. The partnership of public monies and private gifts to fund the building project is still in the experimental stage at Ohio State. Gifts from alumni and friends to the campaign have set a new standard of generosity. Broad-based participation from our alumni during the campaign assures a healthy level of continual support. We set out to equip the College for a position of preeminence among this country's public law schools as a result of the campaign. To reach this lofty yet attainable goal, alumni support will be a key ingredient, now and in the future. I am very pleased to represent the alumni of this law school on this important occasion. Hundreds of volunteers helped thousands of people contribute millions of dollars. The success of the law centennial campaign has demonstrated how firm our friendship is with this great College of Law.

Hon. Paul E. Pfeifer

I stand here today humbly on behalf of all the members of the General Assembly, some of whom are here today, and Stan Aronoff and Vern Riffe as the leaders of the General Assembly, who [helped] fulfill the state commitment. It was a little harder than it should have been and took a little more internal pushing and shoving than it should have because all of you have put your money forward first in a very generous commitment to this extremely important project.

As we look to the future of this university and of this law school, I think we all recognize that the groundbreaking that will take place today is another enormous step forward for this law school. This groundbreaking today is for a future generation of young, nervous men and women who will come here proud of their own accomplishments, confident of the future, ready to learn, ready to be pushed and expanded, and ready to take an important role in our society. That's what the bricks and mortar are about. That's what the groundbreaking is about. And we all treasure and value this institution not for the bricks and mortar but for what it has given each of us, what we have each in our own way been proud to share in the opportunity to put something back.

Hon. Thomas J. Moyer

Hon. Thomas J. Moyer '64

This groundbreaking is a day of expectation—expectation that one day a magnificent new building will stand on this site.

I suggest that this day should also be a day of rededication—the rededication of all of us who have shared the life of The Ohio State University College of Law—that the men and women who study and learn and question within these new walls will be attentive to the permanent principles that have made our profession an indispensable factor to our way of life and attentive to the realization that being a lawyer means more than assuring oneself of a comfortable living. Being a lawyer means living by a code of ethics, representing people with unpopular causes, ensuring that every person realizes his or her own human dignity under a constitutional system of government, and realizing that the legal profession has done more than any other profession or group of people in this country and, indeed, in the history of the world to establish and maintain peaceful societies.

If the men and women who will occupy this new building leave it with that understanding and commitment to our heritage, then we will all be able to look back upon this day as a day that gave us reason to celebrate.

Gerald L. Draper

Part of the mission of the organized bar is the care and maintenance of the legal profession, and we strongly believe as the organized bar that the upgrading of law school facilities is a very essential research and development investment by the profession. We applaud the efforts of all of the alumni and friends of the Ohio State College of Law and the State of Ohio in making this new addition possible. This will improve the facilities of this law school so that it can keep pace with the changing needs and the new technologies that have such a great impact on our entire profession.

Gerald L. Draper

We look forward to remaining in a strong partnership with Ohio State University and the other law schools in this great state to work toward ways to improve the profession, to improve the administration of justice, and to see that all of our efforts are not weakened by any distance that may exist between our institutions but instead will be strengthened by a great spirit of cooperation.

The legal profession, as I see it, is at a crossroads. It is now more important than ever that the practicing lawyers join closely with the law school faculty to work cooperatively to seek solutions to the many problems that we face, and to be prepared to enter into the 21st century together.

Jessica K. Shimberg

This day is a testament to the dedication which so many have to [the] maintenance of an outstanding tradition and the continuing betterment of legal education at The Ohio State University College of Law. Today is a doubly festive occasion in that we are not only breaking ground for our new building, but we are also celebrating the return of our alumni.

Jessica K. Shimberg LIII

You, the alumni, are an inspiration to us as aspiring alumni. The enthusiasm with which you return each year to celebrate the fact that you graduated from OSU sends a powerful message to the College, the students, and to the community at large.

In 1990, the College of Law can be proud of many things. Most of the ingredients which go into making an outstanding law school are already here at 1659 North High Street, and have been here for many years. We have an administration that is dedicated to legal education; we have a faculty that is committed to cultivating eager, legal minds (though sometimes they are not so sure they are eager); we have a bright and motivated student body (though I am slightly biased); we have an excellent library; and we have the support of a fine university and active alumni.

Today marks an exciting beginning that is certain to culminate in the addition of the final ingredient, an outstanding facility in which to house the strengths that we already possess. It is for this that I thank you for being here, and I thank those of you who have had a vision: a vision of a better place that my successors will be able to dwell in.

Bernard J. Costantino

The architect's role is that of a generalist, bringing together a design team and managing a design process. No one person puts together a major construction project—it requires a team including architects, engineers, special consultants, and of course the client, all contributing their expertise, their points of view, and all committed to a successful project.

Bernard J. Costantino

We've enjoyed working with the law school, and we look forward to a successful and rewarding construction phase.

Kenneth Rohlfing

This project has been extremely challenging for us. It required us to deal with severe site constraints,...an ambitious program of requirements, a complex client organization with high expectations—and a fixed budget.

Kenneth Rohlfing

This site is the first view of the campus for many visitors, acting as an introduction or gateway to the larger campus beyond. The form of the addition recognizes this in its configuration—it literally points toward the center of campus. The geometry of the addition's two exterior walls join at this point to create a new entry and identity for the College. Fundamentally, we sought an architecture that would be a responsible neighbor, that would enhance the lives of those who inhabit its spaces, and that would inspire the quality of legal education provided to future generations. Time will be our judge—we hope we have succeeded.

Bravos For Professor Lynn.... Distinguished Alumnus

Appause and accolades are not unfamiliar to a man like Professor Emeritus Robert J. Lynn '49. He has won the affection and respect of law students, colleagues, and the practicing bar over his distinguished academic career, one which has spanned six decades beginning in the late 1940s.

Although a man recognized 'in his own time,' honors have not changed the humble, quiet demeanor of this gifted teacher and scholar. Professor Lynn has been elected Outstanding Professor at the College of Law by graduating classes an unprecedented four times since the inception of the honor in 1971. He was named to the College's first endowed chair in 1987 as the John D. Drinko-Baker & Hostetler Professor of Law, and he was honored by the Ohio Bar Foundation as recipient of the Outstanding Research in Law and Government Award in 1983.

But the night of October 4 was the opportunity for alumni to honor their teacher, counselor, and friend. It was a special night to say, "Thank you, Bob Lynn...for all you have been, and are, to students and to this institution to which you have devoted your teaching career."

It, too, was a special night for Professor Lynn. The Distinguished Alumnus Award was an honor which he graciously and thoughtfully accepted. "Awards for teaching are satisfying...as a series of triumphs, but I am reminded of my own shortcomings early on," recalled Lynn. In his soft, entertaining style, he recounted some of his growing pains as a teacher. But through all the humor came the remarks of a committed educator. In an interview with the OSU Alumni Magazine, this vintage Lynn quote captures the essence. "If you're going to be a teacher, whether it's of kindergarteners or

"I deeply appreciate this honor, and I thank the many people in my life that made this possible. To my students, thank you and be sure to take the time to smell the roses."

Robert J. Lynn '49

of graduate students, you have to like being with your students. I do," said Lynn.

The honoring of Bob Lynn brought out one of the largest Alumni Annual Return crowds in recent memory for the dinner held at the University Ramada Inn. Sharing in the bravos of this distinguished career were Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong, former teacher and recruiting dean of Bob Lynn; Hon. Robert E. Holmes '49, Ohio Supreme Court Justice and Lynn's law school classmate; Nancy L. Sponseller '77, Alumni Association president; C. Douglas Lovett '76, former student; Professor Lawrence Herman, colleague; Robert M. Duncan '52, National Council chair; and Dean Francis X. Beytagh. Joining Professor Lynn for the evening were his wife, Margaret Mary, and his son, James.

Professor Lynn earned both his B.A. and his J.D., summa cum laude, from The Ohio State University. He began his teaching career in the College of Commerce during his senior year in law school. With the encouragement of Dean Strong and other law faculty, he enrolled in the graduate law program at Yale University in 1950 and was recruited to the faculty of the College for the fall of 1951. He completed his dissertation and received his J.S.D. in 1952. With the exception of three visitations to Yale, Illinois, and U.C.L.A., Lynn devoted his entire teaching career to Ohio State. He retired from the full-time faculty in 1989, but continues teaching on a special contract. He joins the ranks of Professors Robert E. Mathews and Robert J. Wills '34 as those faculty with the longest teaching tenures in the history of The Ohio State University College of Law.

The fifteenth College alumnus to receive the Distinguished Alumnus Award, Professor Lynn joins the elite group of very special graduates whose names follow: Isadore Topper '27, Clarence D. Laylin '06, Thomas F. Patton '26, C. William O'Neill '42, Roger H. Smith '40, John W. Bricker '20, Donald Clinton Power '26, Charles Clifford Callahan '34, William M. McCulloch '25, J. Paul McNamara '32, J. Gilbert Reese '52, Thomas E. Cavendish '53, William K. Thomas '35, and Grace Fern Heck Faust '30. It is worthy of note that Professor Lynn shares this distinction with his property teacher, mentor, and friend Charles Callahan.

Professor Lynn has been an innovative teacher, a productive scholar, and a faculty leader. In the words of Dean Strong, he has "...earned a AAA rating in the academic marketplace." His award as Distinguished Alumnus represents the high esteem in which he is held by two generations of law graduates. He truly exemplifies the best of the teaching profession.

Congratulations, Professor Lynn....you shall always be special to the many who have learned from you and who have shared your insights, support, and special humor. You honor us and our College as Distinguished Alumnus.

"Like Mary Poppins, you have the demanding, gentle sweetness that makes the medicine go down."

Frank R. Strong

"You are admired and respected for your professional excellence and personal qualities."

Hon. Robert E. Holmes '49

"In a profession driven by words, you have been a laconic saint."

Lawrence Herman

Reflections of Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong

As the finale to a busy weekend of alumni relations activities, a videotaped interview with Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong was held in the Moot Courtroom of the College of Law on Sunday, October 6. Participating in the interview were Assistant Dean Joanne Wharton Murphy '58, Professor Emeritus Robert J. Lynn '49, and Professor Joan M. Krauskopf '57, all three former students of Dean Strong. The video will be part of the centennial history being chronicled by the College and will become part of the library collection.

The following are condensed excerpts from the interview.

The Building Process

Joanne Wharton Murphy (hereinafter, JWM): Welcome back to the College of Law for your second groundbreaking. It is on the foundation of the Law Building constructed during your deanship and which has served us for nearly 35 years that we will soon begin our capital improvements for the Law Building Addition.

Let's go back to the early 1950s and revisit the history of what some refer to as "Page II." When did you begin, as a faculty, to realize the inadequacies of Page Hall?

Frank R. Strong (hereinafter, FRS): That went back into the '40s and perhaps even before that. There had been some improvement in the stack area in Page Hall, but it was still very much crowded. Indeed, a substantial portion of the library was in boxes, not particularly available for students and faculty. So the press for a new building went back to the deanship of Jefferson Fordham and the law school was getting toward the top of the list [for capital funding], but [we were] in vigorous competition with the College of Agriculture, which certainly did desperately need additional space. It so happened that Dean Fordham left (after the tragedy of Bob Hunter's death) in the summer of '52, and I was finally made dean on November 17, 1952. As I recall, within a few months the issue about whether or not there would be appropriations for a more adequate building came to a head-on competition with basically, as I remember it, the College of Agriculture. And I think it was early in 1953 that I had a call from the Administration Building to come over [for] a determination about what was going to happen.

Jacob Taylor, whom I had known as a professor in the College of Commerce, was the [then] Vice President. I was ushered into the President's office, and President Bevis, Jake Taylor and I met. That's when Mr. Taylor said that the best they could do would be a $90,000 improvement of Page Hall.

JWM: That would be simply improving the area, but not expanding it at all?

FRS: It wouldn't have been much expansion, even then, for $90,000. And there was encouragement that I would accept that idea. I told them, "Nothing doing," and I fell back on a football analogy (which is kind of appropriate for Ohio State). I said, "You're talking about this law school running in the Ohio Conference and," I said, "if that's what you want to do, give me a sheet of paper and I'll resign because I'm not going to be any part of it. Why don't we run in the Big Ten?" That was apparently a little shocking to them. Happily, the Board of Trustees were of a different view.

More particularly, Jake Taylor said that the legislature would never appropriate enough money for an adequate law building. I said, "I don't believe that, but I'm going down and talk with Bill O'Neill." Bill was governor at the time, and I got an appointment with Bill very soon [after that]. I told him what Mr. Taylor had said, and happily Bill said, "He doesn't know what he's talking about." He said we could get the appropriation for a new building.

He apparently called Mr. Taylor and told him he was mistaken. [At that time] Isadore Topper and Senator Bricker were quite close politically, and Isadore Topper said, "I'm going to talk with Senator Bricker." Fred Fuller, who was senior partner of that big Toledo firm, was so provoked at this idea that we'd have to live with Page Hall he said, "I'm going to call President Bevis and tell him if you don't build a new building for that law school I'm going to apply at the University of Michigan to transfer my diploma." So that's how it started. The alumni were just terrific.

JWM: History seems to repeat itself. Without the legislature, and without our alumni, and without our alumni in the legislature, I think the current enterprise would not have gone forward—much like you found in the early '50s. What role did the alumni play in working with the legislature?

FRS: As I've indicated, Bill O'Neill was the top man in the government of Ohio, and there were others. Hugh Jenkins was one I remember; I think Hugh had been Attorney General. There was Emory Glander, he had been Tax Commissioner of Ohio; and others whose names I can't recall at the moment. They not only brought pressure on the administration in the ways I've indicated, but there were others in the legislature that of course helped.

JWM: We talk about this building as being done in two segments. The first part was the classroom section. And then the second part of the building was added in the late fifties and completed in 1959. What was behind doing this building in two segments?

FRS: Money. When they hired the architect from Cincinnati, who turned out to be a wonderful man, they planned for the whole structure. However, there wasn't the money to build the whole structure, so the architect figured out to build this classroom part where we are now as the first step. We had to get the rest of it. Of course, that was another time of difficulty because there were those who said, "Well, you'll never get the other $2.5 million; you'll probably have to wait three or four legislatures." Of course, we didn't like that idea, and fortunately we did not [have to wait, due to] alumni of this law school [and] others who were sympathetic; some of them were in the legislature. Another man, by the way, was Clarence Laylin, Pete Laylin, one of the most celebrated graduates this law school has ever had. They talked to the right people, that's all. And we had the larger appropriation for it immediately.

JWM: You returned to Ohio State this weekend to share in the groundbreaking ceremony for our new building, so I'd like to have you reflect a little on the time that you and Justice Burton and Senator Bricker broke ground in this empty meadow on High Street. There are several things I would like to ask you about, one of which is the exterior of our building. How were the granite inserts conceived; were they the architect's suggestion?

FRS: Yes. Marshall Martin, the wonderful architect that we had, he determined that he was going to put those six granite panels up there. That caused a most terrific problem in the faculty. I guess we had them ten or more years and the question was, well, it's too bleak without something written on each of them. This was the year that Henry Hart was a visitor—the only time in the career of Henry Hart when he was away from Harvard Law School. Oh, what times we had in the faculty trying to agree on those six statements. The first one is from the Bible: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth will set you free." Well, that's the second half of a total statement, and it bothered me some that it was not exactly taken out of context, but separated from the rest of the forepart of that statement. So you'll notice outside, up at the top, there's a little word, "And," to show that it was connected from something before it.

Building on Tradition

JWM: We are realizing even at this point that at the end of our addition project to this building we still may have shortfalls for the completion of the renovation of this building and for proper office equipment and desks for the new section. Does that ring any bell of familiarity to you as a problem?

FRS: Yes, on a smaller scale, they're the same thing. Because the money had all been eaten up in the construction, the question was now about the internal facility and the chairs [and so on]. We wanted these two lounge areas that Vaughn [Ball] conceived of with this Moot Courtroom in between to have nice furniture. We were not allowed to call them "lounges" because state appropriations...couldn't build "lounges." Where was this money going to come from?

The University said, "You'll have to use the old stuff out of Page Hall." At the same time, we were faced with an understandable [state] regulation that you had to buy prison-made furniture unless you could get a waiver from the man downtown, who would give a waiver if you could talk him into it. So I had to go downtown and cultivate him, and the end was that he released everything except the chairs in the classrooms. That was quite a victory. But still, where would we find the money to go out on our own, so to speak, and the dedication of 1960 was coming up, and what would we do? Now that's when I took advantage of the friendship of Bill O'Neill. I went down to him and told him the situation; the end of that was an $80,000 special appropriation. The next day after I'd come back, Gordon Carson called me up and gave me holy hell for jumping channels. And I said, "Well, Gordon, we had to have the money."

JWM: Yesterday, at the end of our groundbreaking, we had a roundtable about how you envision the needs of legal education when you're planning today for a facility that's going to have to serve your students and your faculty for a quarter of a century. What did your faculty go through in those days to think about the future, which you really did plan for very well?

FRS: Well, faculty of course helped, especially those who were on the building committee. Norman Lattin was the chairman of the original building committee for this part. And Erv Pollack, because he was to be the librarian, was chairman of the building committee for the second part. They all helped.

JWM: At the time we built that building, did people think that you were being extravagant in terms of the amount of space that was being committed to the library?

FRS: Ooooh, my....With respect to the second phase, the library and the faculty offices, there were empty offices; we didn't have the faculty to fill them up, and boy, that drew criticism. You know: "Those people over there got all that empty space," and so on. There was a great amount of criticism of that. But that was the only way to build the building and anticipate the future as well as we could. Pollack was a genius at figuring out how to purchase the stacks for the library that would hold the greatest number of volumes. I don't know how he did it, but Erv Pollack really anticipated the future for this great library.

Alumni Organization and Development

JWM: It is my understanding, as I look back on the history of the law school, that really you were the first dean to put in place an alumni organization and involvement of the alumni to raise funds. And this was rather unique because as a public institution we had always thought you looked to tuition and to state appropriations for this. How did you get alumni involved in committing personal gifts to the law school for its needs?

FRS: Essentially by going out over the state and visiting them, visiting the alumni. I can't claim too much credit for this because as I became dean there were appropriations so that there would be more than one person in the dean's office. And that was the secret, I think. Let me also give full credit to Paul McNamara, for he's the one that had the idea of the alumni affair, which was so very successful...(I)t's your Annual Return.

JWM: You know, he's still one of our most active alums and he organizes the best reunions for the Class of 1932. But there were other things that you influenced, such as the Law Forum Lectures which have now been renamed the Frank R. Strong Law Forum Lectures. You also organized the National Council of alumni advisers. I believe that was an organization that you put together with people like Paul McNamara and Isadore Topper?

FRS: Yes. I was so pleased what's happened as far as the lecture name is concerned. But I'd like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the alumni of this law school, especially the group that I knew. They were just wonderful. I'd start out, (by this time our children were grown) and Gertrude, my wife, would go with me, and we'd travel, especially in the summer when school wasn't in operation except for a relatively small summer school. We would go out over the state.

Well, the first type of visiting as I recall was just going and getting acquainted without saying anything about money. Apparently in Cleveland they weren't very much impressed with the school here in central Ohio, and Dean Fordham had been concerned about that. But the second go-around I would be very frank with them. I'd call them ahead and so on, and ask if I could see them, and I'd tell them, "Hang onto your pocketbook; I'm looking for money." They had been, so many of them, contributing five or ten dollars a year to the development fund because a notion was abroad that by doing that they'd get better football tickets.

JWM: I would say there's still some of that today.

FRS: Five dollars and ten dollars weren't going to do very much for a new law building, but rather for the monetary needs together with a law building. And immediately they would, depending on their resources, instead of the five or ten dollars going to the development fund, it'd be $25, $50, $100, $1000. It was so gratifying the way they responded, just marvelous.

JWM: You know, I have a feeling, Dean Strong, that you were to the law school what a Woody Hayes was to athletics. You endeared yourself to so many people. To have Frank Strong come to their hometown, to their office, was enough for anybody not only to open up their hearts, but to open up their pocketbooks.

FRS: I loved going out and talking with the alumni. It was a great experience.

If we have time, I'd like to mention the American Bar Association meeting I always attended which met in San Francisco. I think the year was 1962, and I talked Vice President Carson into enough money for a trip after the meeting of the Association. I went up and down the California coast. The [alumni] cards showed about 100 alumni up and down the coast and somewhat inland, but never very far. And in three weeks, I either saw or talked on the telephone with 75 of the 100. That was helpful, let's put it that way, because nobody had been out there before for any such purpose. I'd call a ride ahead to an alumnus whom I particularly knew and ask him or her to set up a luncheon meeting. So that trip of three weeks, to put it bluntly, generated a great amount of new contributions.

JWM: It takes many things to build support and loyalty among alumni, but one of the things is to communicate. You communicated personally by your visitations, but you also communicated from the Dean's office. Do you remember the first vehicle of communication was the Law Record?

FRS: Yes, it was. That was a sad sheet of about four pages to begin with, because it couldn't be financed from state appropriations. So it was only as the alumni began to make more and more generous contributions that we had any funds for a thing like the Law Record, and so it has grown until now it is really a fabulous publication.

JWM: During those years you went on to work very extensively with the American Association of Law Schools. Didn't you become its president?

FRS: In 1960, yes, I was president. At that time I knew many of the faculty all over the country. It was my basic proposition that you ought to get out from the locale and tell your story out over the country in any way possible. Let these other deans know what was going on here. And learn from them also, of course.

The Classroom and Programs

Robert J. Lynn '49

Robert J. Lynn (hereinafter, RJL): Dean Strong was my teacher of Constitutional Law, and I know that he was instrumental in my being hired as an Assistant Professor in 1951. I might state at the outset that I think that most of my classmates would regard you, Frank, as one of the most enjoyable teachers we had while we were law students. I don't imply that we didn't learn from you, rather what I would emphasize is that being in your classroom was a lot of fun....

FRS: Despite the subject matter.

RJL: I remember once there was a student in my class who had failed your class the preceding year. I won't reveal his full name, but you would question him during the classroom hour, and his responses, I take it, were not all that they might have been. You said to him, "Fred, you don't seem to know any more about this subject than you did last year." And Fred said, "Well, Professor Strong, you don't seem to know any more either."

FRS: Well, I rather hoped you'd tell about the fellow from Toledo, I cannot recall his name, but as is true in Columbus there are cloudy days. This was a cloudy day and, as usual, he was late. I don't think he ever got there on time. My practice (which I think was rather ludicrous) was always to welcome the late students. So in [he] comes, and he sat pretty well toward the back. And I welcomed him, and he went on and walked up toward the back. As he got to his seat he said, "Huh, it's about as foggy in here as it is outside." That brought down the class, of course.

RJL: In my own class in Constitutional Law there was a student from Columbus who fairly regularly came in late and once he came in late, walked about halfway up the aisle, turned to you and said, "Professor Strong, it isn't necessary that you stand."

FRS: Oh yeah. Well, we had a lot of fun despite the rigors of law study.

RJL: If my recollection of the dates is right, you began teaching at Iowa in 1934 and you came here in 1937. I think it to be true that you were probably one of the first law teachers in the United States to try to develop objective examinations for law school purposes. Isn't that probably so?

FRS: Well, for Constitutional Law.

A move came along to try and find a way of using objective questions so that the burden of reading essay questions could be reduced. There was a committee of the Association of American Law Schools, there were maybe five or seven of us, and they said to me, "Well, if you can show us that you can do it for Constitutional Law, then we'll figure that it can be done." Well, I don't think I did very well in trying to demonstrate that, but that's when the idea for examinations of a combination of essay and objective questions came in. I know Rolly Stanger went clear over, he would never give an essay question.

Then it was my hope that faculty would use the objective type of exam more or less in the middle of a course to see how things were going, and thus give a preliminary type of examination and not make the grade depend wholly on the final examination. Then, of course, along came this idea of skills training [and the thought] that maybe the more average student would come to understand the principles that we're trying to teach in the field of law by giving them practice in the application. We called it the "second curriculum."

The "first curriculum" was basic subject matter, but overlapping that was the idea of having different kinds of teaching methods, including the so-called "problem methods," that were not wholly a matter of the traditional type of teaching. We introduced the double seminar, which I think was really unheard of in law school, [to give] two types of experience in the third year: one in drafting, which is so important and which is so neglected in traditional legal education (Carl Fulda had come to us and he was tremendous in the drafting seminar with Ohio Legislation); the other was a resource type of seminar, quite different from the drafting. Art Lynn and I had an Antitrust Law and Economics seminar. We had quite a time of that because some of the students ... resented the idea that we urged them to take the principles of corporate law and run them backwards to see whether the increase in the size of institutions in this country was really the consequence of real technology or was it essentially a corporate combination business. Those are some of the things. That was a great period of the '50s; I'll never forget that.

RJL: I remember that Charlie Callahan and Rolly Stanger, in particular, and there may have been others, both of them continued to teach two large sections, but each also took on a small section of about, say, 15 or 16 students. Vaughn Ball helped them to try to make sure that the composition of those classes was approximately the same with respect to credentials. Then they gave all students, irrespective of the size of the class they were in, the same exam.

I remember Charlie being questioned by someone about whether there was a statistically significant, a statistically reliable, difference between the results of teaching a small class and the results of teaching a large class. And Charlie laughed and he said, "I think we're going to have to rely on the intangibles."

Students and Faculty

Joan M. Krauskopf '57

Joan M. Krauskopf (hereinafter, JMK): I really would like to get you to talk a little bit more about your attitude and your leadership in regard to students. One of the things I noticed when I came here is that this seemed to be a much more open place, much more open to students, more confidence in what the students were doing. One time we asked whether we could start a student newspaper and you or Bob Nordstrom said, "Oh sure. Go ahead." Where did you get those wonderful ideas?

FRS: I think that's Midwest. I'm a big Middlewesterner. There's an openness about people in the Midwest.

JMK: You were talking to Bob about a couple of innovations in regard to education for students that I was hoping we could come back to. At the time I was here you required a legal clinic, one quarter for every student, and that was a time in which most law schools didn't even have a clinic.

FRS: Well, that was inherited from older times, under Si Harris, who had passed away before this. I think that the clinic here was the first one established in an American law school. And they were getting out of style by our time. There was always debate in the faculty on how worthwhile that type of training was, but you felt that it was worthwhile when you were taking it, didn't you?

JMK: Well, it was at least unique. It meant, after all, I got to go downtown, see a real client, and get in a courtroom.

Another thing I would like to have you talk about a little bit has to do with mentoring and launching new faculty members. It seems to me you hired a number of people here who were different, a little bit iconoclastic, stuck their necks out, and made names for themselves.

FRS: Went to the best; I always went to the best.

Bill Van Alstyne was a good illustration of that. I had learned about Bill as a graduate of Stanford Law School from Brainard Currie. Brainard told me that he'd submitted an article to Stanford, and that the article editor was a young fellow named William Van Alstyne, and that the way Van Alstyne had helped Brainard smooth out that article was the most fantastic experience he'd ever had.

I got back to Columbus and called Washington, and he was in the Civil Rights Division of the Justice [Department], and asked him if he wouldn't come for a visit. "Well," he said, "to be at all serious about it, it'd have to be a package deal with Carol." When he came, my wife Gertrude took Carol around, and I think in one day she had two or three offers. She was as fantastic as Bill—brilliant, just absolutely brilliant. And there were others, like Paul Carrington and Ken Karst.

JMK: And Ken Karst has become one of the leading writers and scholars in Constitutional Law, particularly on equality. That makes me think about scholarship. I recall when I first came here [as a student], you were my adviser on a law review note and just really worked me. It was on Due Process. Do you remember the time we team taught Administrative Law when you were working on the difference between substantive Due Process and the Takings Clause? That now has become a very hot issue. It seems to me, once again, you were ahead of the academic world in your thinking.

FRS: Finally, I made the Ohio State Law Journal with an article, and that was it exactly—Due Process in relation to the Takings Clause. It suggests a rather radical reinterpretation of the Takings Clause.

JMK: And that was only two years ago. I'd like to mention one other thing because both as a student and a young faculty member I was very aware of what I perceived as the importance of your wife, Gertrude.

FRS: After I was named dean, Gertrude and I started traveling over the state. Well, she was wonderful about it, and [she worked with] a student group of women, mostly wives.

And another thing about the building. When both units were complete, there was a question about colors and the type of furniture for the faculty offices and so on. And the University said, "We don't have any money; we can't help you." And she's the one that has given the color to this building, in great part. She measured the size of those offices to determine the kind of desks to put in each one and so on. Yes, I like to brag on her.

JMK: You've been a good mentor for us. You certainly changed my life, Frank, and I know you've changed a lot of people's lives.

FRS: Been changed for the better?

JMK: Yes. I wasn't going to teach until somehow or another you people asked me to.

Thank You

JWM: This visit, regretfully, is coming to an end. For those of us who had you as a teacher, for those whom you have mentored, for the whole profession of legal educators for whom you were so visionary, and for this institution, we shall ever be in your gratitude for your contributions.

Frank, you're an unusual person. You are endeared to everybody who has known you. So we will continue to ask about your good health, and we shall continue to benefit from your many contributions. It has been just a wonderful occasion to have you return to Ohio State University.

FRS: Thank you. I appreciate everything.

Lecture Renamed

Frank R. Strong Law Forum Lectures

On the occasion of the return last fall of Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong, the faculty voted to honor the former dean by the renaming of the Ohio State Law Forum Lecture Series. The announcement was made by Dean Francis X. Beytagh at the Alumni Annual Return Dinner on October 4 at the University Ramada Hotel. Dean Strong returned to Columbus to participate in the dinner honoring Professor Emeritus Robert J. Lynn '49 and the groundbreaking for the Law Building Addition. The present Law Building was planned and constructed while Strong served as dean.

The Ohio State Law Forum is another of Dean Strong's legacies. The Forum was established as the College's first endowed lectureship in 1958. The lectureship was made possible through a generous gift from Isadore '27 and Ida Topper.

The lecture series has brought distinguished academicians, jurists, and government officials to the College. The early lectures were published by The Ohio State University Press and in recent years by the Ohio State Law Journal. The 1991 Frank R. Strong Law Forum Lecture was presented at 7:30 p.m. in the Ohio Union Conference Theater on March 12 by Professor Martha L. Fineman, University of Wisconsin. Her topic was "Feminism In Legal Theory:

Dean Beytagh congratulates Dean Strong on renaming of Law Forum Lectures in his honor.

The Difference It Makes."

Dean Strong was pleased with the renaming of the lecture and by this expression of respect and appreciation for his many contributions to the successes of this institution.

Professor Kay Visits Ohio State

Herma Hill Kay

Professor Herma Hill Kay, Richard W. Jennings Professor of Law at the University of California, Berkeley, and past president of the Association of American Law Schools, made a whirlwind trip to the College of Law in late August. The purpose of her visit was to further her research "for a book on early women law professors." According to Kay, "the book will be about women who were fulltime, tenure track professors at American Bar Association-approved and Association of American Law Schools-member schools between 1900 and 1959."

Professor Joan M. Krauskopf '57 of the College of Law faculty is one of the twelve women who fits the parameters of Kay's study. Professor Kay came to Ohio State to interview Professor Krauskopf and to talk to members of the faculty who knew Professor Mary Ellen Caldwell, who was a member of the faculty from 1966 to 1974.

A distinguished scholar in her own right, Professor Kay received the 1990 Research Award from the American Bar Association. She is the author of two casebooks and over 30 book reviews and articles.

She received her Bachelor of Arts degree from Southern Methodist University, magna cum laude, in 1956. While in law school at the University of Chicago, Professor Kay was a book review editor for the law review. She was elected to the Order of the Coif upon graduation in 1959, and went on to serve for one year as law clerk to Justice Roger Traynor of the California Supreme Court. She joined the Berkeley faculty in 1960 and has happily remained there ever since.

Placement Points

by Pamela H. Lombardi, Director of Placement

Editor's Note: The College of Law is pleased to welcome Pamela H. Lombardi to our staff. She joined the College as Placement Director in October after a thorough national search. Lombardi worked most recently as Director of Career Planning at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law. She joined Cleveland-Marshall as an assistant director of law placement in 1983 and was promoted to director in 1986.

In addition to managing a program for Cleveland-Marshall's 1,000 law students, Lombardi served a number of professional organizations. She is a past president of the Law Placement Association of Cleveland and has served on the National Association for Law Placement's national nominating committee.

Lombardi received her M.Ed. with concentration in human resource development in May 1990. Her B.S.E. in speech with concentration in public address was earned in 1970.

Her pre-law administration background includes a variety of positions in human resource management in retail, service and manufacturing environments. In seven years with the Ford Motor Company's Cleveland Engine Plants, Lombardi held a number of positions including placement coordinator, labor relations representative and personnel analyst. Other positions she has held include assistant personnel manager for Reliance Electric Company's Ivanhoe Plant and Blue Cross/Blue Shield.

This year's On-Campus Interviewing Program was extraordinary in many respects. Second- and third-year students had extremely strong credentials with median grade point averages ranging between 3.40 and 3.44 and LSAT's averaging in the top 20 percent nationally. In response to this ever-increasing caliber of the student body, a new on-campus interviewing program which eliminated pre-screening was implemented. A new placement director was hired in October. These changes and a significant downturn in legal hiring combined to make the 1990 recruitment season one of the most challenging on record.

Signs of a slowing legal hiring market came early in the recruitment season. Firms that traditionally extended offers to all summer clerks made fewer offers of permanent employment in an effort to reduce the size of the 1991 entering class of associates. This downsizing caused many firms to eliminate their third-year recruitment activities. Third-year students who performed well during the summer and might have received an offer of permanent employment in healthier economic times were forced back into the recruitment process.

Downsizing also impacted second-year hiring. Firms anticipating smaller entering classes reduced the size of summer programs. Although fewer offers were made to second-year students, there will be less competition for permanent positions among summer clerks.

The newly-implemented on-campus interviewing program worked reasonably well for both students and employers. A preliminary survey indicates that more students were interviewed than in past years. As we track offers and acceptances, we anticipate that greater diversity in interviewing patterns will result in offers to students in a wider range of both the second- and third-year classes.

On the whole, employer response to the new on-campus process was favorable. Much of the credit goes to Cynthia J. DeJacimo, placement program assistant, who managed the 200-plus employer program single-handedly until the new placement director arrived in mid-October. Employers reported full interviewing schedules with few or no cancellations during on-campus visits. Students arrived on time and were fully prepared. Cynthia did an outstanding job educating both students and employers so both groups could efficiently utilize the new system.

As with any new system, there is always some fine tuning that can improve the program over time. We are in the process of surveying both students and employers to determine how effectively the system accomplished our goal of creating greater opportunities for more students. Adjustments that can enhance the program will be implemented prior to the spring on-campus interviewing program. In the interim, we appreciate the understanding and support that we have received from our many campus recruiters.

Our Work Begins: Alumni Assistance Needed

As exciting and challenging as the fall on-campus interviewing program was, now the real work begins. Given the economic downturn, a number of third-year students are still seeking employment. Dean Beytagh, student representatives, and concerned faculty will be working with the Placement Office to develop an aggressive program for placing these students in positions commensurate with their talent. As always, we encourage you or your employer to contact the Placement Office should you wish to hire law clerks or attorneys with zero to five years of experience.

Admissions Trends

by John P. Henderson, Associate Dean for Student Affairs

The second largest applicant pool in the history of the College, 1902 candidates, produced 221 well-qualified students in this year's entering class. The Admissions Committee worked diligently to select this Class of 1993. Academically, it is one of our strongest groups of first-year students. The enrolled students have a median GPA of 3.54/4.0 and a median LSAT of 39, an 86th percentile score on this standardized test. They range in age from 21 to 48; 43 percent are women, 16 percent are minority group members, and about 20 percent are from out of state. Eighteen states are represented in this entering class. Thirty states and the District of Columbia are represented in all three currently enrolled classes.

As usual, Ohio State and Miami (Ohio) have the largest number of graduates in this entering class. The University of Michigan, Michigan State, and Northwestern rank third, fourth and fifth, respectively. Most of these students are Ohioans who left the state for their undergraduate education and are returning to Ohio to pursue their legal education.

This is an interesting, diverse, and academically strong class that will make a significant contribution to society and the profession in the coming years.

Interest in legal education remains high throughout the nation as 1991 begins. Test-taker volume is up eight percent after three administrations of the Law School Admission Test. (One more test administration is scheduled for February.) Applications to law schools nationwide were up 7.5 percent as of early December.

Applications for admission to The Ohio State University College of Law have increased from 1130 in 1986 to 1902 in 1990. This represents a growth in the volume of applications of almost 70 percent. We are currently running about 10 percent ahead of last year's volume. It appears now that we will have more than 2000 applicants for the first time in the history of the College. Our Admissions Committee faces another difficult task as it prepares to select the Class of 1994.

Library News

The Ohio State University College of Law Library is one of the College's finest features. At last count, the collection numbered over 550,000 volumes, with access to the general University collection of more than 4,000,000 volumes.

One of the strengths of any library is the staff, and the College has been blessed with very talented librarians over the years. In this column, the Editor introduces a new permanent addition to the library staff, Melanie K. Putnam.

Melanie Putnam earned her Bachelor of Arts degree in Linguistics from the State University of New York at Fredonia in 1977. While in undergraduate school, she spent a year as an exchange student at Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznan, Poland. She returned after graduation to teach English in Katowice, Poland, for one year. In 1980, she graduated from the University of Wisconsin with a Master of Arts in Library Science.

From 1978 to 1983, Putnam worked in various capacities for the University of Wisconsin library system, including the University of Wisconsin Law School Library. After moving to Columbus, she worked for a brief period in a major Columbus law firm before accepting a position with the Ohio Supreme Court Law Library. "I am in my element in a large library setting," Putnam observed. She was promoted from Reference/Audio-Visual Librarian to Head of Public Services in September 1986.

Working at Ohio State has been a long-term goal for Putnam. "Since I have been in Columbus, I have always wanted to return to an academic, Big Ten University law library setting," she stated. Her current position is Reference Librarian, and she has recently been given responsibility for all government documents.

She is currently coauthor of a 250-page book which will provide an overview of all materials available regarding Ohio law. The contract with Hein Publishing Company calls for the book to be published in 1991. The project keeps her busy, but she hopes the final result will be useful to those doing legal research.

(Editor's Note: We regret to inform our readers that Prof. Alan Holoch, Director of the Law Library, passed away on February 4. See related story on p. 37.)

Students Host Prominent Speakers

Throughout the semester, the College of Law is constantly visited by people, usually lawyers, who have been asked to speak to students by either the administration or one of many student organizations. The stories which follow are examples of the many opportunities for learning available to law students outside the classroom.

Art and Obscenity

Tami Sirkin, a first-year student at the Ohio State College of Law, knows H. Louis Sirkin as her father. But the majority of the country knows him as the lawyer who defended Curator Dennis Barrie in the Robert Mapplethorpe trial.

H. Louis Sirkin, left, defense attorney for Dennis Barrie in Mapplethorpe trial, discusses case with lecture attendees.

H. Louis Sirkin's November 7 lecture at the College, sponsored by the campus chapters of the National Lawyers Guild and the Gay and Lesbian Law Caucus, was well attended. Although fifteen years of his life have been spent defending First Amendment rights, the Mapplethorpe trial broke new ground, according to Sirkin; for the first time a curator of a respected museum, the Cincinnati Contemporary Art Center, was charged with pandering obscenity in an art exhibit—namely, the late Robert Mapplethorpe's "The Perfect Moment."

The five photographs in question were tried separately from the whole exhibit, a procedure, Sirkin argued, which defied legal as well as artistic precedent. Since "The Perfect Moment" was a retrospective, it served as a biography of Mapplethorpe's life and work, explained Sirkin. He argued that the fact that some of the photographs reflected a period of his life during the 1970s of indiscriminate sexual activity did not take away from the artistic value of the work.

"Art is not always pretty," said Sirkin. "It's not meant to be. Art is to make us consider things about ourselves and the world that we may not like to see or think about."

One key to the case, he said, was the question of intent. The intent of the exhibit's compiler, Curator Janet Kardon, was not to put together a "sex show," nor was it the intent of Curator Dennis Barrie to present one. Rather, Sirkin argued, the intent of both parties was to display the work of a respected photographer of the 1970s and 1980s.

Sirkin said one positive effect of the controversial trial was that it forced many people to take sides on the issue of freedom of speech. However, the case may also cause museums to consider controversy before their educational role in the community, despite the acquittal, cautioned Sirkin.

Exporting to Japan

The International Law Society of the College of Law sponsored a late afternoon forum on Japanese trade on Wednesday, November 7. The featured speakers were Daniel L. Waterman, Director of the Ohio Department of Development, and Hajime Takahiro, Senior Adviser to Mitsubishi Trading Company. Takahiro was visiting in Ohio as part of a special program of the Japanese government to help increase American exports.

Waterman prefaced his introduction of Takahiro with a description of the Ohio Department of Development and its offices and programs for export promotion. Through cooperative programs with the United States State Department and local chambers of commerce, "expertise is mobilized to encourage Ohio companies to not only think globally, but to enter foreign markets," explained Waterman. Takahiro's visit was a collaboration between the Department of Development and the

Hajime Takahiro and Daniel L. Waterman

Japanese government under a $110 million program of the Japanese Import Trade Organization (JITO). The goal is to support counseling to American companies by Japanese trade specialists.

Takahiro, who was in the United States on a two month visitation, outlined the use of tax incentives, loan programs, tariff reductions, and expert counseling as current efforts undertaken by the Japanese government to stimulate Japanese import markets. "My aim is to increase Ohio product export to Japan. It is simple to say, but difficult to do," cautioned Takahiro.

JITO implements the import promotion program with information centers in Japan and abroad, assignment of product specialists, such as Takahiro, market study analyses and entry strategy consultations. To date, the largest sectors for American imports to Japan are agriculture and lumber.

The United States and Japan represent the largest economies in the world (40% of the world's Gross National Product). For this reason, Takahiro indicated that the relationship and interdependence of the two countries required more equalization of trade flows.

Centennial Plans Take Shape

"It will be the birthday party of the century," vowed Nancy L.

Sponseller '77, president of the Law Alumni Association and chair of the Centennial Planning Committee. Committee members are working to put together a spectacular celebration for Friday, September 13, in the Ohio Union ballrooms. The party will launch the law school into its year-long celebrations and into the beginning of its second century. "We expect the biggest turnout ever in our history," she reported, "and we will be asking many, many alumni to share in the festivities. This will be our way of promoting our law school within the university, the community, and the nation," said Sponseller.

One hundred years ago, in the fall of 1891, the law school had its inauspicious beginning as a few students gathered in the Franklin County Courthouse to hear law lectures. "During our celebrations, we will trace the people and events which have made Ohio State one of the nation's great public law schools," explained Dean Joanne Wharton Murphy '58, coordinator of the year-long festivities. "This is a special time to take pride in our College and in ourselves as graduates and lawyers who have contributed to our profession," Murphy reflected.

Many exciting programs are being planned for the 100-year celebration. Put the dates and activities listed below on your calendar.

Centennial Planning Needs

OSU Law Family Tree: The College of Law seeks to identify graduates who have had other members of their families (parents, grandparents, siblings, children, aunts, uncles, etc.) also receive their law degrees from Ohio State. Many families have generational connections with the College, and we urge you to provide this information.

Photographs: The College also seeks to obtain photos which graduates may have taken on campus or at the law school (either Page Hall or the Law Building), or photos of law school activities that may be considered for our centennial pictorial history. Please send to the College with the proper identifications. All photos will be returned.

Interesting Stories: Anecdotes can add special interest to the recounting of history and the people who have made the history. Please forward any such stories you feel would be of interest for future generations.

In-kind Contributions: The Centennial Committee will be looking for all kinds of assistance with printing, decorations for the Centennial Birthday Ball, art work, video production, entertainment and a host of other items that will make the centennial celebrations over the next year special and memorable. Anyone wishing to contribute time or other in-kind services, please contact Dean Joanne Wharton Murphy, (614) 292-2937.

Law Centennial Campaign Highlights

- A total of just over $15 million in cash, pledges, and deferred commitments was raised between May 1, 1985, and December 31, 1990, against a goal of $12.7 million.
- Alumni participation in the campaign now stands at 41%.
- The John D. Drinko-Baker & Hostetler Chair was established by Elizabeth and John D. Drinko. This was the first fully-funded endowed faculty position for the College of Law.
- The Newton D. Baker-Baker & Hostetler Chair was established through additions to the principal of

- the Newton D. Baker Professorship.
- Two other endowed faculty positions, the Lawrence D. Stanley Professorship and the Isadore and Ida Topper Professorship, were established during the campaign.
- Commitments were received from Charles and Florence Ebersold and Grace Fern Heck Faust and Leo Faust which will establish two additional endowed chairs in constitutional law.
- The James E. Chapman-Baker & Hostetler Law Library Fund was established, marking the beginning of a planned effort to increase endowments for the Law Library.

- Over $500,000 was added to the College's resources designated for financial aid and scholarships. During the campaign, tuition and fees have increased by 40%, making financial aid an even more important priority of the College.
- More than 2700 contributors have participated in the Law Centennial Campaign, allowing the College to begin the Law Building Addition and Renovation Project. When completed in 1992, the College will have a first-class facility in which to enhance the academic program of the law school.

Unrestricted gifts from alumni and friends totalled over $750,000 during the campaign. These gifts permitted the College to fund faculty research, the Law Library, financial aid, and many other important programs at levels beyond our state and University allocations. Annual giving will be most important over the next five years as the College moves forward.

The partnership of public funds and private gifts totalling over $16 million makes possible a much needed addition to and renovation of the Law Building. When completed, the College will have a first-class facility for the next twenty-five or thirty years.

Our heritage of an excellent teaching faculty is enhanced by the establishment of two chairs and two professorships during the campaign. Two more endowed chairs were pledged through deferred gifts. The College needs seven additional endowed faculty positions by the year 2000 to attract and retain the best faculty.

Naming Opportunities

Although the College of Law has broken ground for the Law Building Addition, there are some naming gift opportunities remaining for donors to the campaign. Such gifts provide donors with the opportunity to establish a memorial room, honor a senior partner in the law firm, or sponsor the physical facilities which will house important law school areas, such as the Clinical Programs Suite, the Center for Socio-Legal Research, and the Law and Finance Center.

Donors interested in these naming gift opportunities are encouraged to contact Dean Beytagh or John R. Meyer, Director of Development.

Alumni Giving

Alumni Giving. The following are gifts, pledges and deferred commitments made to the College of Law Centennial Campaign between May 1, 1985, and December 31, 1990. During the campaign, commitments were received from 2,764 donors or 41% of the alumni of the College.

Reporting Methods. Alumni are listed by class in alphabetical order. Donors of $25,000 or more are noted by bold-faced italic type. Donors of $5,000 to $24,999 are noted by italic type.

Alumni donors who are now deceased are denoted with an asterisk following their names. Also listed in this report as contributors are members of The Presidents Club through deferred gift programs. Insurance premiums and bequest provisions are not calculated as part of the campaign total, but individuals are recognized for their involvement with the College and are corrected in the donor total.

Notice: Every effort has been made to ensure the accuracy of this listing. In 1992, the College plans to publish a complete Centennial Report. If you find an error in this preliminary list of donors, please contact John R. Meyer, Director of Development, at your earliest convenience. Thank you for your assistance.

"Academic prominence in the years ahead will belong to those universities that create a strong partnership of public support and private philanthropy. The Ohio State University Campaign is predicated on this view of the future of higher education.

"The College of Law Centennial Campaign is a major part of this historic University effort. Since its funding in 1891, the College of Law has had a distinguished tradition of academic excellence as well as support from both the public and private sectors. Now is the time to look forward to an even greater future. With the support of alumni and friends, the college will begin its second century with the resources to become one of America's preeminent public law schools."

In Memoriam To Professor Alan Holoch

On Saturday, February 23, a memorial service for Alan Holoch, Director of the Law Library and Professor of Law, was held in the Main Reading Room of the Law Library. Students, colleagues, and friends from Columbus and around the country gathered to celebrate the life and contributions of Alan Holoch, who died of cancer on February 4, 1991, at the young age of 43. Although Professor Holoch had been a member of the faculty only since 1987, his special human qualities and his leadership contributions leave a lasting legacy to The Ohio State University and this College.

Professor Holoch received a B.A. degree from Washington University in St. Louis in 1969, an M.S.L.S. degree from the University of Southern California in 1971, and a J.D. degree from USC's law school in 1978.

Prior to coming to Ohio State, Professor Holoch held various professional positions at the University of Southern California

Law Library, and from 1978 to 1982 served as Associate Director. From 1982 to 1987 he was Director of the Law Library at the Villanova University School of Law in suburban Philadelphia. In his years as Director of Ohio State's Law Library, he participated actively in the planning and design of the College of Law's 95,000 square-foot building addition. Ground was broken for the $16.5 million project in October, and construction is expected to begin in April. Over one-half of the new space will be for library purposes.

Professor Holoch was also instrumental in the Law Library's adoption of a new collection development policy, adaptation to changing information technology, improving services to faculty, students and other users of the Law Library, and coordination with other law libraries in Ohio and across the country. He was active in the American Association of Law Libraries, serving as Treasurer and Executive Board member from 1986 to 1989, and in various organizations involved with libraries and legal education.

Dean Francis X. Beytagh commented: "Alan Holoch was a warm and energetic person. He was a very competent professional who had earned the respect of his fellow law librarians around the country. His determination and persistence regarding the library aspects of our building addition project contributed significantly to an effective and imaginative design. In a real sense, the new building he did not live to see will be a testament to his abilities and dedication. Above all, Alan was a gracious and generous human being who cared for and gave to others. He faced impending death with courage and serenity. All of us will miss him greatly."

For those who may be interested, donations may be made to The Ohio State University Law Library in Professor Holoch's memory.

Affirmative Action Within The Law School: Promises and Problems

Note: These two pieces on affirmative action summarize a presentation made at a faculty colloquium on October 26, 1990, by Professors Jacobs and Kozyris who divided the pro and con sides, respectively, between them. The context was law school admissions and faculty recruitment. The focus was not on the constitutional or statutory dimensions but on the questions of policy within the wide realm of permissible action. While both authors support some forms of affirmative action including at a minimum rationales based on an individual remedy, role-modeling, and some diversity, as well as a broader view of credentials, they have different approaches as to how to go about it. They also share the view that other positions, such as strict neutrality, are not to be treated as necessarily racist or sexist and, furthermore, that all discussion on these issues, however robust, biased or obnoxious, should remain free and unhampered within academia.

Point: The Promise of Affirmative Action

—by Professor Louis A. Jacobs

Louis A. Jacobs

The legacy of slavery and persistent racism and, to a lesser but significant extent, sexism in the United States has been an intractable form of victimization. Affirmative action programs (AAP) differ from an antidiscrimination approach which essentially says to victims of discrimination that from now on everyone will be treated equally. Declaring equality is of little use to those hampered by the legacy of discrimination. When equal opportunities produce no real opportunities, a vicious cycle occurs: those who were victims tend to remain in a subordinate rather than equal position.

Antidiscrimination efforts demand the impossible: attacking systemic, subtle, and pervasive discrimination on a case-by-case basis. Certainly, some individuals are nonetheless able to escape the cycle. Yet, at the rate that the antidiscrimination approach operates, generations of former victims will remain in a subordinate position absent AAP.

Early AAP proved largely ineffectual in remedying that disgraceful legacy because they failed to utilize criterion-conscious means; they simply enlarged the competitive pool without in any way addressing the necessity of revisiting the procedures and standards of the competition. When goals and timetables were adopted, procedures and standards modified to appreciate the special contributions minorities and women could make, and public schools opened to all races, some progress was made.

At least three justifications exist for engaging in criterion-conscious AAP: (1) remedying discrimination; (2) paying reparations for discrimination; and (3) diversity.

Remedial measures must relate to the nature of the wrong being remedied. When a record of prior discrimination exists, a remedial justification demands that race-consciousness be used to overcome that historical act. For particular individuals who suffered discrimination years ago there is little to be done. Their rightful place here cannot effectively be preserved.

For members of the group to which those individuals belong, however, AAP can undo some of what has been done. Years of nondiscrimination would surely have produced a more balanced student body or faculty as the sons and daughters and nieces and nephews and other relatives or acquaintances attended. So the remedy does the best it can by reaching beyond the individual victim and into the group.

Reparations are due on a societal level, notwithstanding the blameworthiness of any one societal actor. That is, even without a past history of discrimination, the law school as part of this tainted society has a real obligation to engage in AAP.

Diversity may be recognized by an academic institution as strengthening the learning process. Indeed, as the student body becomes more diverse, the faculty composition must follow. Role-modeling is critical to creating a positive learning environment for minority and female students, and the capacity of a member of the same group to serve as a counselor or mentor is far greater than that of a non-member. Finally, diversity brings a perspective to the institution that might otherwise be missed or slighted, notwithstanding the empathy a non-minority or male may have.

Methodology is constantly challenged: (1) stigma may arise from the benign use of criterion-conscious measures because notions of inferiority are promoted; (2) hostility may be incited in those not given preferential treatment; and (3) neutral procedures and standards should suffice.

To suggest to a victimized group that the stigma often produced by AAP should preclude such efforts is hypocritical. The stigma of victimization is so debilitating that

Counterpoint: The Problems of Affirmative Action

— by Professor P. John Kozyris

P. John Kozyris

The pursuit of affirmative action is a noble cause unprecedented in history. Professor Jacobs outlined its achievements and promises, and I will concentrate on its problems which can be summarized in one sentence: excesses by its supporters which threaten to discredit it. While we have been so far able, by and large, to contain these excesses at our institution, the pressures continue to mount, and a great deal of good sense will be needed in the future.

First, the excess of expectations. The eagerness to get results and to expiate past injustices may generate wishful thinking as well as the temptation to impugn the motives of the opposition. The reality, however, will not just go away, and we must take into account four major facts:

a. The very limited pool of prospective minority students and the severely limited availability of eligible minority faculty, aggravated by the possibility that their credentials may have already been upgraded by affirmative action below;

b. The limited potential for remedying past inadequacies in the context of a graduate professional program coming at the end of a long educational line; in evaluating the past performance of law schools at affirmative action, we will be less than candid if we do not concede that the considerable success experienced with women and with some minorities (e.g. orientals) is due mostly to the removal of barriers outside the law school which made our job easier without a significant relaxation of standards; for reasons that are too complicated and difficult to explore, some other minorities, especially the blacks, have not fared as well;

c. The limited means available to provide extraordinary support to those who need it within the institution; and

d. The limited responsibility of an institution such as ours, which for over twenty years has been actively pursuing affirmative action in a manner that stands out both within the University and in comparison to other law schools, for the continuing problems of adjustment of the relevant positions.

Second, the excess of rhetoric and the corresponding danger of dissimulation. The use of slogans to justify action may be understandable but, in a sensitive field like this, where the pressures to take a "politically correct" position are quite strong, it can have distorting effects. It is easier to act to look good and to feel good rather than to be good. Where public relations predominates, the hidden dangers of reverse racism and sexism tend also to be overlooked. In our enthusiasm for affirmative action, are we perhaps also overlooking or glossing over the inevitable tension between it, or at least some versions of it, and the principle of "nondiscrimination" as well as the notion of "equal opportunity"? Furthermore, are we entirely candid with ourselves and with others as to what kind of affirmative action we are truly implementing, e.g., a plus system versus numerical targets, and why?

The latest code word is "diversity." In a general sense and all other things being equal, diversity or at least a proper mix of diversity and uniformity may be a good thing. But what diversity, and why? Are we really interested in different experiences, backgrounds, and viewpoints, and are we genuinely pursuing them? Or are we subconsciously promoting what is essentially a system of proportional representation, a new tribalism based on stereotyping and using the very same criteria that we consider prohibited and bad? Are we focusing on diversity as it pertains to law and legal tradition, or are we mostly accommodating fringe sectarian views that happen to be in fashion?

Third, the excess of expectations plus the excess of rhetoric leads to the excess of means. A system which uses numbers, absolute or percentages, and dates (deadlines) is troublesome in itself, and this is true regardless of whether it operates in the form of "quotas," "goals," "set asides," or the like. The harm that it may cause is aggravated when the realities of demographics are neglected and is further compounded by any euphemistic descriptions of what is really going on.

Put very simply, the fact that, without prior societal and academic discrimination, the numbers of minorities and women as law school students and faculty probably would have been significantly higher, even when coupled with the fact that the increased presence of such persons within the law schools would add value both to the academic environment and to society, does not lead automatically to the conclusion that, therefore, numbers and dates should be used, even as a last resort, to override our system of qualifications in order to produce a hypothetical ideal mix.

The "numbers and dates" system is problematic because it is likely to cause four kinds of harm:

a. Harm to fundamental principle, to equal opportunity in favor of equality of result and of proportional representation, and to the prohibitions against the use of irrelevant and over-inclusive or under-inclusive classifications and it overwhelms the potential stigma from AAP. Indeed, while a kneejerk reaction to criterion-conscious efforts may well be the notion that the preferred minorities or women are inferior and unable to compete on their own, the enlightened reaction must be that a qualified or qualifiable individual is inferior only with regard to overcoming decades of victimization. Popular ignorance must never control; education about why criterion-conscious AAP exist, the history of discrimination, and the abilities of those given a chance should be aggressively pursued.

Even if stigma were the inescapable cost of AAP, that price is one that students and faculty candidates must be allowed to pay for the opportunity. Opportunity does not guarantee results. Minority and female students or faculty may fail in their efforts and, given the odds many from those groups face and the nature of a predominantly non-minority male institution, can even be expected to have a more difficult time. The alternative of not being given that chance dooms them to failure in this profession, one they apparently chose despite those odds.

In much the same way, antagonism must be confronted, not allowed to influence our choices. What irony to tell victims of discrimination that remedial programs may be greeted by non-minorities and males with a new form of antagonism. Again, education, not capitulation to those who refuse to understand, is preferable.

That non-minority male applicants and candidates will be adversely affected by criterion-conscious AAP is obvious. Only by adopting the myth of the best qualified, though, can that impact be deemed inequitable. To the contrary, given the legacy of discrimination, that impact is one that must be borne by all of us. Because the impact is so dispersed, that is, non-minority male applicants and candidates are still finding plenty of law schools to admit and employ them, any inequity is minimal.

Finally, the general irrelevance of race or gender in no way undermines the specific relevance in an AAP context. By irrefutable logic, the most direct remedy for a race-conscious exclusion is a race-conscious inclusion.

These challenges to AAP intrinsically adopt the myth of the best qualified or extol the virtues of a pure merit system. Institutions often take so narrow a view of qualifications that what is really meant is credentials used as a proxy for a closer review of the individual. Stigma and antagonism will decrease once a broader view of qualifications is understood; indeed, the very perspective, role-modeling, or accessibility a minority or female professor brings constitutes a form of qualification.

More importantly, superb students and great teachers and scholars are not guaranteed by excellent grades, fine schools, and prestigious job experience. There is certainly less institutional risk in selecting such candidates to join the student body and the faculty, and probably less nurturing required for such students' success or candidates' promotion and tenure.

By broadening the pool of applicants and candidates viewed as qualified, such AAP offer a viable means of providing a remedy, paying reparation, and securing diversity. Rather than proportional representation as a goal served by admitting students and hiring and promoting faculty based on group membership, this AAP serves those objectives functionally: a remedy is tailored to the degree of institutional culpability, reparations are calibrated by societal culpability, and diversity is measured by achieving a critical mass of group members to avoid tokenism and deliver results in the areas of role-modeling, counseling, and perspective.

Affirmative action demands the institution bear such risks and burdens. Those who plead for gradualism ignore the hollow promise in Brown v. Board of Education of "all deliberate speed."

The time for criterion-conscious AAP was yesterday; we are too late as is. The risks are not that great, the burdens not unreasonable. The promise of AAP is attainable.

Counterpoint (from p. 39):

against stereotyping; furthermore, if group reparations are justified, they are best provided in the form of money or other support at the grass roots and entry levels rather than through misplacement at graduate academic institutions;

b. Harm to the institution, by not admitting or hiring the best-qualified candidates;

c. Harm to others, to those who are not favored and therefore excluded from the special treatment and who may not have been personally responsible (or do not perceive themselves to be responsible) for past inequities; and these others are not likely to be the privileged classes in our society, but mostly the other disadvantaged groups in the lower middle class who have been working hard and patiently awaiting their turn at the door of equal opportunity; and finally, and most importantly,

d. Harm to the intended beneficiaries, subdivided into:

1) the presumptive stigma of being less capable, which undermines not only the confidence of their peers and the public, but also their own self-respect;

2) the misplacement at institutions where, for objective reasons, they cannot compete as effectively against better-credentialed peers and the fear of charges of paternalism or condescension limits the opportunities for remedial assistance;

3) the incentive to segregation for mutual support in self-defense,

Counterpoint (from p. 40):

especially in view of the latent resentment of the non-beneficiaries; and

4) the implicit threat that the numerical standard at some point will change from a floor to a ceiling.

A genuine "plus" system, especially when coupled with an aggressive recruitment program, is superior not only in principle but also in practice because:

a. it facilitates the individualized examination of credentials outside the rigid stereotypical classifications which may group together quite dissimilar constituencies (e.g. Hispanic-surnamed), to determine whether a particular candidate has attributes which are not adequately reflected or quantified in the formal credentials or which justify a claim for special treatment or which are of special value to the institution; and

b. once the the plus factor is added in the proper and generally modest proportion, the selection proceeds on a genuinely meritocratic basis and without the pressure of numbers and dates.

While we should continue and expand our efforts to strengthen our affirmative action where it is needed the most, we should be careful not to compromise our long-term objectives and subvert the legitimacy of our program by doing improvident but showy things now.

We should keep reminding our impatient colleagues and constituencies that there are no short cuts to heaven, and that we resent any "holier than thou" attitudes, especially since our function is not to demonstrate our personal generosity, but to distribute fairly and equitably shares in the public patrimony. In conclusion, we should continue to pursue affirmative action vigorously but also wisely, shielding it not only from the arrows of its enemies but also from the embraces of its zealots.

Faculty Highlights

Francis X. Beytagh attended the American Bar Association (ABA) Annual Meeting in Chicago in August and served as a panelist on the Association of American Law Schools (AALS) Development Committee Workshop. In October, he chaired the ABA/AALS inspection team at the University of Texas School of Law in Austin, Texas.

The Dean served as a panelist on the Sixth Circuit Appellate Practice Institute in Cincinnati in November. Earlier that month he traveled to Washington, DC, to attend the AALS Faculty Recruitment Conference and to interview United States Supreme Court law clerks regarding their interest in law teaching.

He recently attended the AALS Annual Meeting in Washington, DC. While there, Dean Beytagh was a panelist on the role of law schools with respect to continuing legal education. He also moderated a panel discussing the pros and cons of being a law school dean.

The Dean continues his efforts to strengthen relationships with the College's graduates by participating in alumni luncheons while in Chicago, Youngstown and Washington, DC.

He also chairs the ABA Law School Facilities Committee, which met in Washington, DC, during the AALS Annual Meeting in January 1991, and is a member of various boards and committees at the local, state and national levels, which are involved with legal education and the legal profession.

Sanford Caust-Ellenbogen has published an article entitled "False Conflicts and Interstate Preclusion: Moving Beyond a Wooden Reading of the Full Faith and Credit Statute" in 58 Fordham Law Review 593 (1990). The article proposes using a new approach to determine the extent to which states must recognize the judgments rendered by sister states.

Howard P. Fink is finishing work on a handbook on the Ohio Rules of Civil Procedure, coauthored with Professors Charles Wilson and Arthur Greenbaum of the College of Law faculty, to be published in 1991 by the Michie Company.

He completed his twenty-fifth year at the College in June. Congratulations!

In October, Professor Fink attended a meeting of the Professional Development Committee of the Association of American Law Schools (AALS), to which he has been reappointed for a three-year term. That committee oversees the professional development programs of the AALS, such as the New Teachers Workshop, and the conferences on subjects such as contracts, administrative law or clinical education held at different times of the year and at the annual meeting of the Association.

Next summer, he again will teach in the College's pre-law program at the University of Oxford.

Professor Fink continues for the sixth year as chair of the College's Planning Committee which worked with the architects to develop the plans for the College's new addition and renovation for which ground was broken in October. He remains the College's representative to the Campus Campaign Committee, the University Computer Committee and the AALS House of Representatives.

David A. Goldberger recently completed an article entitled "Sources of Judicial Reluctance to Use Psychic Harm as a Basis For Restricting Racist, Sexist and Ethnically Offensive Public Speech." It will appear in Volume 56 of the Brooklyn Law Review in the spring.

He was a participant in the Annenberg Foundation Workshop on "Racist and Sexist Speech on College and University Campuses" held in Washington, DC, on April 12. In July, Professor Goldberger was reelected as general counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union of Ohio Foundation. He also attended the Midwest Conference of Clinical Teachers in October and an ABA Conference in November entitled "Making the Competent Lawyer: Models for Law School Action."

Arthur F. Greenbaum participated in a panel discussion on "Law Placement in the 1990s" at the College of Law's fall National Council meeting. In October he spoke at the Columbus Bar Association's Litigation Practice Institute on "Current Developments in Civil Jury Trial Practice in Ohio." His chapter, "The Civil Jury Trial and the Ohio Rules of Civil Procedure," was published as part of the conference materials. Professor Greenbaum continues to work with Professors Fink and Wilson on their upcoming book on the Ohio Rules of Civil Procedure.

L. Camille Hébert co-taught, with faculty members from other parts of the University, the 1990 Summer Institute of the Commission on Interprofessional Education and Practice held June 20 to 22, 1990, on the subject of "Interprofessional Approaches to the Problems of Drug Abuse in Today's Youth." She spoke on "The Legal Issues of Juvenile Drug Abuse," including the response of the juvenile legal system to drug abuse by minors, the rights of juveniles suspected of drug abuse, and the duties of lawyers representing minors accused of drug abuse or drug-related crimes.

Professor Hébert made a presentation entitled "Privacy Issues Related to Substance Abuse, Disease, and Disability" at a seminar on "Substance Abuse, Disease & Disability in the Workplace" sponsored by the Columbus Bar Association on September 14. In her presentation, she focused on the protections available to employees facing employer actions to test employees for use of controlled substances and exposure to the HIV virus linked to AIDS.

On September 7, 1990, she spoke to the Kansas Bar Association in Overland Park, Kansas, on "Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1990," focusing on recent judicial and legislative changes made to that statute. She has also completed a chapter on Title VII for the Kansas Bar Association's Employment Law Manual to be published in early 1991.

Lawrence Herman administered

Ohio State's 1990 Summer Program for Pre-Law Students at Somerville College, Oxford, England. He also taught a course entitled "Introduction to Anglo-American Legal Systems."

Professor Herman's article on body searches will be published shortly in the supplement to the Encyclopedia of the American Constitution. He is now working on the third draft of a book-length article entitled "The Unexplored Relationship Between the Privilege Against Compulsory Self-Incrimination and the Involuntary Confession Rule."

In November, Professor Herman advised Ohio State's teams in the Ohio-Michigan Regional Round of the National Moot Court Competition in Cleveland.

Timothy S. Jost completed the manuscript on the second edition of his Health Law casebook, which will be published by West Publishing Company in the spring. He also published two short articles on Medicare peer review organizations and on nursing home reform in the international journal, Quality Assurance in Health Care. He continues to work on a property casebook, which is designed to permit teaching of professional responsibility and alternative dispute resolution in the first-year property course. He also is working on an article examining the role of Medicare peer review organizations in cost containment. Finally, chapters he has written will appear in the spring in books on health care facilities law and health care regulation.

P. John Kozyris presented a paper entitled "Cross-Border Insolvency" at the XIII Congress of the International Academy of Comparative Law, held in Montreal in late August, which was published in 38 American Journal of Comparative Law 271-282 (Supp. 1990). The article focuses on the extraterritorial effect of American bankruptcy law and practice and on the comity extended to foreign proceedings, claims and persons. Two additional articles will appear in Volume 39 of the American Journal of Comparative Law under the titles, respectively, of "Values and Methods in Choice of Law for Products Liability" and "Choice of Law in the United States Courts in 1989." The former article criticizes interests analysis as a viable conflicts approach and proposes a specific set of rules to govern choice of law for product liability claims. The latter article reviews judicial developments in the conflicts field in 1989. A philosophical piece entitled "In the Crucible of Jurisprudence" is nearing completion. This article challenges the validity and utility of some "modern" theories of jurisprudence.

In the fall of 1990, Professor Kozyris was elected as a member of the Executive Council of the American Society for the Comparative Study of Law for a two-year term and was also appointed to a two-person team to prepare the American participation in the XIV Congress of the International Academy of Comparative Law of 1994.

In early December 1990, Professor Kozyris visited the law school of the University of Genoa, Italy, with which the College has a program of collaboration, and delivered a series of lectures on the following topics: Highlights of U.S. Corporate Law — Main Differences with Europe; Insider Trading in Corporate Securities — Substance, Extraterritoriality and Some Comparison with the E.E.C.; Employee Ownership of Stock and Participation in Corporate Management — Some Comparative Observations; and the Proposed United Nations Code on Multinational Corporations.

Joan M. Krauskopf continues her active involvement in family law issues. She recently researched and analyzed Ohio property division and alimony law in the context of a major legislative revision of Ohio law and advised several lobbying groups on the proposal. She has started a brief article on the legislation, H.B. 514, which will become effective on January 1, 1992. She has begun work on the second edition of her treatise, Advocacy for the Aging, originally published by West Publishing Company in 1983.

Professor Krauskopf attended, as an adviser, the Drafting Conference of the American Law Institute's Restatement of Principles Governing Family Dissolution in Philadelphia on November 1-3. She also attended the American Law Institute Annual Meeting in May in Washington, DC.

She has maintained her involvement with the American Association of Law Schools (AALS), and continues to serve on the National Executive Board of the Order of the Coif. As Secretary, Professor Krauskopf drafted the newsletter for the AALS Section on Aging and the Law. On July 21, she made a presentation on types of scholarship at the AALS Workshop for New Law Teachers. She also made a presentation at an all-day workshop on Family Law prior to the AALS annual meeting in January 1991.

On November 17, she made a presentation, "Spousal Support in the Nineties," to 325 judges and members of the family law bar of Oregon in Portland, Oregon.

Professor Krauskopf is serving this year as chair of the College's Promotion and Tenure Committee. In addition, she is chair of the University Provost's Committee on Probationary Period Extension. As chair of The Ohio State University Council on Academic Excellence for Women, she conducts monthly meetings, introduces speakers at events such as receptions for new, promoted, or tenured faculty or promotion and tenure workshops, and administers a project on Women in Science which included coordinating a workshop on February 28 with speakers invited from outside the University.

Stanley K. Laughlin, Jr., spent the month of July at Oxford University, Oxford, England, directing and teaching in the Oxford-OSU Summer Law Program. In March he participated in a conference of the Association for Social Anthropology in Oceania held on Kauai, Hawaii. His latest article, "The Court Systems of the U.S. Territories," will appear in the University of Hawaii Law Review later this year.

Lee M. Modjeska has recently completed two articles, "On Teaching Morality to Law Students" and "The Supreme Court — Labor and Employment Law — October Term, 1989," to be published shortly in the Journal of Legal Education and the University of Dayton Law Review, respectively. He is currently writing several books and articles on labor and criminal law, and is coauthoring casebooks on labor arbitration and employment discrimination law.

Earl Finbar Murphy

Earl Finbar Murphy has continued as chair of the College's Special Programs Committee which has prepared a proposal for a graduate LL.M. degree to be offered within the College and upon which the faculty has acted favorably. He again has served on the Wayne Nichols Memorial Lecture Committee in the University's School of Natural Resources and remains on the Board of Visitors of the Indiana University School of Law at Indianapolis.

Professor Murphy has been working on the quantitative groundwater law section of a new edition of the multi-volume treatise, Water and Water Rights, now edited by Robert Beck and to be published by the Michie Company. The new edition is expected to be published in 1992.

He was a speaker at the College's expanded orientation program for beginning law students, conducted August 16-18, and he remains the faculty adviser to the College's Environmental Law Association. He continues as courtesy professor in the School of Natural Resources, College of Agriculture, and as a member of the faculty of the interdisciplinary Atmospheric Sciences Program. He has been appointed as a representative of the College to the University's Urban Affairs Commission.

Professor Murphy attended a meeting of the Friends of Malabar Farm on October 17, 1990, at Malabar Farm, as well as University meetings on the OSU/University of Genoa connection. He remains active in the World Society for Ekistics, headquartered in Athens, Greece.

John B. Quigley has published two recent articles. "The Need to Abolish Defenses to Crime: A Modest Proposal to Solve the Problem of Burden of Persuasion," 14 Vermont Law Review 335 (1990), argues that the concept of a "defense" in criminal law has the drawback that it makes an exculpatory circumstance appear to be separate from the elements of the offense. The article contends that defenses are circumstances negating culpability. This controversy has implications for allocation of the burden of proof, since the accused cannot constitutionally be required to negate elements of an offense.

"The Transformation of Eastern Europe and the Convergence of Socialist and Capitalist Law," 26 Willamette Law Review 937 (1990), takes the position that the recent move in the direction of market-economy law in eastern Europe should not be viewed as a repudiation of a governmental role in the economy. It shows that Western legal systems reflect considerable governmental intrusion in economic matters and suggests that the legal systems of eastern Europe are likely to retain many such elements.

Professor Quigley spoke at the University of Illinois College of Law about his recent book, Palestine and Israel: A Challenge to Justice. He recently spoke on the same topic on Columbus radio station WTVN. During the fall, he also spoke about the Persian Gulf crisis on radio stations WTVN and WOSU.

In July he presented a paper at a law panel at the Fourth World Congress on Soviet and East European Studies in Harrogate, England. His topic was "The Romanist Character of Soviet Law."

He spoke on the Arab-Israeli conflict at First Community Village in Columbus and about the Persian Gulf at the North Columbus Friends Meeting in November. He also made presentations to the residents of Jones Graduate Tower and the College of Law's International Law Society on the Persian Gulf situation in September and November, respectively.

Rhonda R. Rivera gave the keynote address on "AIDS and the Law" at an AIDS and Mental Health Conference sponsored by the Ohio Department of Mental Health on June 12. She spoke about "Sexual Orientation and Employment Law" at AT&T Bell Laboratories later in the month.

In September she made a presentation at the University of Iowa Law School on "The Current State of Sexual Orientation Law." She was also the lead speaker for a Contemporary Scholarship on Lesbian and Gay Lives Lecture Series entitled, "Lesbians, Gay Men, and the Law: Issues for the 1990s," held at Pennsylvania State University.

Professor Rivera was recently named to the Board of Advisors of the Stanford Journal of Law, Gender, and Sexual Orientation.

On October 19, she spoke on "Lawyers, Clients, and AIDS — Litigation Involving Sexual Orientation Discrimination and/or AIDS" at a Litigation Practice Institute continuing legal education program sponsored by the Columbus Bar Association. In addition, she presented "Legal Aspects of HIV" to OSU medical school students in connection with the medical school's Student-to-Student Program.

Nancy H. Rogers was recognized for Distinguished Service by the Society of Professionals in Dispute Resolution for her work as chair of that organization's Law and Public Policy Committee. She participated in the presentation of the committee's report, "Mandated Participation and Settlement Coercion: Dispute Resolution As It Relates to the Courts," at the annual conference in Dearborn, Michigan, on October 25.

The 1990 supplement to her treatise, Mediation: Law, Policy, Practice (coauthored with Craig A. McEwen), was published by Lawyers Co-Operative Publishers Company.

Professor Rogers spoke on dispute resolution at the Justin A. Stanley Bar Symposium for bar leaders in Boston on November 1 and participated in a panel at the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association Conference in Pittsburgh on November 16.

Allan J. Samansky

Allan J. Samansky was the speaker at a meeting of the Capital Tax Club held on September 14. His topic was "Offering a Former Residence for Rent: Opportunities and Problems." In addition, he was one of three local panelists for the November 28 educational session sponsored by the Legal and Tax Advisory Committee of the Columbus Jewish Foundation; the title of the session was "Techniques for Charitable Giving of Real Estate and Closely Held Business Interests." On January 25, 1991, Professor Samansky was a commentator at the Capital University Law Review Tax Ethics Symposium; his presentation will be published in the Capital University Law Review.

With Professor Braunstein, Professor Samansky has taught a continuing legal education course entitled "Representing the Client Active in Real Estate." The course, which had also been successfully offered last spring, was presented in Columbus on December 6 and 7 and in Cleveland on December 20 and 21.

With his coauthor, Professor James Smith of the University of Georgia School of Law, Professor Samansky continues to update semiannually his treatise, Federal Taxation of Real Estate, which has been published by Law Journal Seminars-Press. The most recent update appeared in October.

Morgan E. Shipman continues as a member of the Board of Editors of Ohio Lawyer and as an active member of the Corporation Law Committee (and its Subcommittee on Tender Offers) of the Ohio State Bar Association.

In June, he spoke in Columbus on Ohio's new merger moratorium statute at the program, "Corporation Law: Update and Overview," sponsored by Ohio CLE Institute. In September, he served as the moderator of a program, "Ohio's New Anti-Takeover Law," sponsored by American CLE Seminars, Inc., and held in Cleveland, Ohio. He also made a presentation at the conference entitled "Ohio's New Merger Moratorium Statute." In October, he addressed a luncheon meeting of the Stark County Bar Association in Canton, Ohio, on the topic, "Ohio's 1990 Takeover Legislation."

Gregory M. Travalio, Associate Dean for Academic Affairs, is completing his final year on the University Athletic Council. This academic year he is serving as chair of the Ticket Committee of the Athletic Council.

Professor Travalio finished the U.S. Marine Corps Marathon in Washington, DC, on November 4 in a time of 3:59:36.

Douglas J. Whaley is teaching a year-long course (six semester hours) in Commercial Law. Offered by Professor Whaley only once before, the class combines the courses in Sales, Commercial Paper, and Secured Transactions. He has 110 third-year students in the course.

The second edition of Problems and Materials on Commercial Law was published by Little, Brown & Company in time for use in the 1990-1991 school year. His new casebook, Problems and Materials on Consumer Law, will be published in the near future.

David Williams, II, has been appointed vice-chair of the Continuing Legal Education Committee of the ABA's Section on International Law. He has also been elected to a three-year appointment on the University Faculty Senate's Committee on Women and Minorities.

Fall Term Visiting Professors

The College of Law has benefitted from the talents and abilities of two visiting professors during Autumn Semester 1990. Judith L. Maute visited as a full professor of law from the University of Oklahoma College of Law. Richard V. Wellman, Alston Professor of Law at The University of Georgia School of Law, was the visitor holding the John D. Drinko-Baker & Hostetler Chair for the semester.

Judith L. Maute

Judith L. Maute

Professor Maute taught Sales and Debtor/Creditor courses during the fall, but her areas of interest are much broader. In fact, she has taught classes in Alternative Dispute Resolution, Contracts, Professional Responsibility, Gender-Based Discrimination, Legal Profession, Civil Rights and Civil Liberties, and Constitutional Litigation.

Professor Maute expects two articles to be published in the near future. "Mediator Accountability: Responding to Fairness Concerns" will appear in Issue 2 of the Missouri Journal of Dispute Resolution, and "Public Values and Private Justice: A Case for Mediator Accountability" will be published in Volume 4 of the Georgetown Journal on Legal Ethics. In addition, she is extensively involved in a legal history project reconstructing Peevyhouse v. Garland Coal Company. (See related story on p. 46.)

Her other works in progress include an empirical analysis on the extent to which the foreseeability limitation still has genuine application entitled "Foreseeability of Consequential Damages: Does Hadley v. Baxendale Still Live?", and "As We Forgive Our Debtors," a review essay she expects to be published in 1992.

Professor Maute describes herself as "backing into law school." Upon graduating with an A.B. from Indiana University at Bloomington in 1971, she worked for over three years with the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission. She went on to receive her Juris Doctor degree, cum laude, from the University of Pittsburgh in 1978, where she served as a member of the law review. She then engaged in private practice for about three years. "I found it very frustrating in practice to be unable to pursue the implications of a legal principle because I could not bill the client for it," observed Maute. She proceeded to Yale for her LL.M. degree, graduating in 1982, and left New Haven to embark on a new career in law teaching.

Maute took a teaching position at the University of Oklahoma College of Law, where she is now a full professor and four-time recipient of the Calvert Law Faculty Award for extraordinary service, scholarship or teaching.

Richard V. Wellman

A native of Columbus, Professor Wellman was no stranger to the OSU campus. He came to the College of Law from The University of Georgia in Athens, where he is the Robert Cotton Alston Professor of Law. He has spent the last three semesters away from Georgia: the fall term of 1989 as a visiting professor of law at University of Illinois College of Law, the winter term of 1990 as Fujiyama Visiting Professor of Law at the University of Hawaii, and the fall term of 1990 at Ohio State as the John D. Drinko-Baker & Hostetler Visiting Professor of Law. While at Ohio State, he taught Gratuitous Transfers and a seminar on Fiduciary Administration.

Wellman received his Bachelor of Arts degree in 1947 and the Juris

Richard V. Wellman

Doctor degree in 1949 from the University of Michigan. In law school he served on the law review and was elected to the Order of the Coif upon graduation. He practiced law in Cleveland and Mt. Vernon, Ohio, prior to joining the University of Michigan law school faculty in 1954. He left Michigan in 1974 to accept the position he now holds at The University of Georgia.

A distinguished scholar, Wellman has published numerous books and articles in the areas of probate and property law. He is a member of the American Bar Association, American Law Institute, and American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, and presently serves as adviser to the Reporter, Restatement of Property, Donative Transfers.

His principal service activity, however, has involved more than twenty-five years of effort related to the Uniform Probate Code. He served from 1966-1969 as Chief Reporter, and from 1970 until the present, first as Educational Director and now as Executive Director, of the Joint Editorial Board for the Uniform Probate Code. Wellman also has been a delegate, first from Michigan and presently from Georgia, to the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, and became a life member of this organization in 1990.

When asked about his time here at Ohio State, Wellman said, "I have enjoyed my time back in Columbus. Ohio people, their law students and their lawyers can be proud of this law school—it is a good one."

Faculty Colloquia

In keeping with a long-standing tradition among the faculty, the College of Law hosts several faculty colloquia each semester. The presenter and the subject matter of each colloquium vary widely, but all who participate agree the gatherings are both enjoyable and informative.

Peevyhouse Revisited

On October 12, Visiting Professor Judith Maute gave a presentation to the faculty on a pending legal history project: "Peevyhouse v. Garland Coal Company Revisited: The Ballad of Willie and Lucille."

For those unfamiliar with the case, the Peevyhouses granted strip mining rights to Garland Coal on the condition that remedial work be done on completion of the strip mining. Garland quit the premises without doing the work or offering a legal excuse for non-performance. Peevyhouses sued for $25,000, the cost to complete the remedial work; Garland Coal defended claiming damages should be limited to the diminution in value of the property because the work would only nominally increase the land's value. The jury awarded $5,000, and both parties appealed to the Oklahoma Supreme Court. In a 5-3 decision, the court affirmed plaintiff's judgment on liability, but reduced the damages to $300.

Peevyhouse appears in many contracts and remedies casebooks, and is the subject of much scholarly comment and speculative folklore. Some legal economists like the efficient remedy and suggest the plaintiffs' insistence on replacement cost represents opportunistic bargaining. Others use it to argue for greater access to specific performance, or that the token remedy exemplifies systemic problems in the legal system. Some cynically refer to the Oklahoma Supreme Court bribe scandal and infer the case is tainted.

Professor Maute has worked for several years to collect information about the case. She has collected extensive material concerning contract formation, performance, litigation, and the cast of characters. She has interviewed the plaintiffs and the lawyers and reviewed numerous court records.

The Peevyhouse project has sparked interest among lawyers around the country, according to Maute. A manuscript is in progress and we look forward to reading the results of her investigation.

Style and Content of Judicial Opinions

Ohio Supreme Court Justice Herbert R. Brown spoke to the faculty at a colloquium on November 30. His topic was "Style and Content of Judicial Opinions." Because many people do not understand the inner workings of the Court, Justice Brown took a few minutes to give the faculty "some background" before proceeding to the topic of opinion writing.

Justice Brown explained the system for accepting an appeal from a lower court. Four out of seven justices must vote to certify a case for appeal and the justices only accept about one of eleven petitions for certiorari, so the case must be "of great public and general interest," stated Brown.

Due to the heavy case load of all judges, Justice Brown has found that, "(a) judge, no matter how conscientious or bright or attentive to duties, is doomed to be a shallow person. Even on an important case, we just handle it and move on."

Justice Brown also spoke to the length of the opinions generated by the Court today, stating, "I think the opinions are too long [overall]." He went on to elaborate, however, that most opinions do not "expose...what may be the tenuous part of the argument" because the author must write them as persuasively as possible to garner support from the other justices.

An opinion conference is held after a draft decision, authored by a justice voting in the majority, has been circulated to all of the justices. At this point, "opinions are [often] reformed to incorporate the views of the other justices," stated Brown. A final version is eventually developed, approved, and issued as the Court's majority opinion.

Justice Brown cautioned that while lawyers must "look to the literal language [of an opinion], they must also look to the value of what underlies the language." In essence, lawyers must remember that there exists in judicial opinions a "stare decisis of values—not only of language."

Justice Brown is particularly well suited to make remarks on the topic of 'opinion writing.' He is the author of several novels, one of which was recently accepted for publication.

Soviet Property Law

The guest speaker at the faculty colloquium held on December 7 was Professor Eugene Roulko from the Institute of International and Comparative Law, Kiev University Faculty of Law, Ukraine, U.S.S.R. In his presentation he explained that at the present time the most urgent problem in the Soviet legal system is the law of property. The new legislation on private ownership does not go far enough, and many new laws have not been sufficiently clarified to determine permissible action.

On the constitutional level, the situation is very confusing. The Soviet Constitution has been amended to the effect that the Communist Party is no longer the supreme governing body of the state and the Federation government and the governments of the individual republics disagree on how to divide the political power between them.

Meet SBA President Shimberg

Editor's Note: This column is part of a continuing effort to introduce our readers to today's law students. The students at the College of Law are an increasingly well-qualified, diverse group of women and men with but one common goal: to learn how to become effective advocates in a complex, litigious society. Jessica K. Shimberg is an outstanding example of what it means to be an Ohio State law student.

Student Bar Association President Jessica K. Shimberg is a wonderful representative for the College of Law. Articulate and well-spoken, she exudes an air of quiet confidence rarely found in one so young.

Born in Manhasset, New York,

Shimberg, now a third-year student, moved to Columbus with her family when she was five years old. A graduate of Upper Arlington High School, she began her college career at Indiana University at Bloomington. She transferred to Boston's Brandeis University, founded in 1948 and named for United States Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis, after her freshman year. She found Brandeis to be not only "an excellent academic institution, but a place that gave me the opportunity to participate in many activities." Shimberg elaborated that, "because of the youth of the school, I was able to have an impact, as an individual, on the character of the institution. For example, I founded, with several others, a jazz vocal octet—Company B—which continues today."

A politics major with an emphasis in Latin American and third world countries, Shimberg was unsure of what she wanted to do after graduation. "I had been interested in going to law school for some time, but when I graduated from Brandeis I did not want to make the commitment of time and money to a career until I was more certain about my dedication." She decided to work for the American Arbitration Association's Boston office, an experience she describes as a positive one "because working with attorneys gave [her] a general view of the practice of law," and reinforced her decision to become a lawyer.

Commitment and desire to become involved and make a difference show through in all she does at the law school. She is always willing to give of her time, attending receptions, luncheons and speeches on a routine basis.

Last summer, Shimberg worked in two different capacities. She served as a law clerk to Judge Ronald L. Solove '70, Franklin County Common Pleas Court, Domestic Relations Division, performing legal research and writing tasks in the area of domestic relations. She also worked in the law firm of Sowald, Sowald & Mas.

Shimberg's plans after graduation are not yet settled. "I am still looking for that perfect spot in a small- to medium-sized firm. I would like to do family law work and civil rights litigation."

College Hosts OSBA President

Ohio State Bar Association President Gerald L. Draper spoke at a luncheon sponsored by the OSBA but held in the College of Law Student Lounge on October 11. Nearly 100 law students listened as Draper, partner with the Columbus office of Thompson, Hine & Flory, outlined the trends in the legal profession and the reasons supporting the active involvement of young lawyers in the organized bar.

According to Draper, there are 750,000 lawyers in the United States—twice as many as there were 20 years ago (150,000 are female, 28,000 are black, and 15,000 are Hispanic). By the year 2000 that figure will jump to 1 million. In 1988, the legal profession was a $73 billion industry, with 16 percent of those revenues received by 4 percent of the nation's lawyers.

Draper then addressed the increased emphasis on billable hours in the law firm environment. Primarily, law firms now have the data available to make statistical rules for the firm's attorneys. However, he warned, "The economics of law practice have become very shaky. There is a shift toward quantity versus quality in many of today's firms." And young attorneys "need to question and challenge the profession" on these issues and others, said Draper.

Justice Kennedy Visits OSU

The Honorable Anthony M. Kennedy, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, visited the campus of Ohio State for two days in late October. On the evening of October 22, he addressed a large crowd of undergraduates at Weigel Hall. The next day, he attended a luncheon of Ohio State and Capital law school faculties at the OSU Faculty Club. He then returned to the College to speak to a "standing room only" crowd of OSU and Capital law students.

We at the College of Law have been fortunate enough to host five United States Supreme Court Justices, including Justice Kennedy, in recent years. Justice Harry A. Blackmun visited the College of Law in connection with the Alumni Annual Return in November 1982. Justice William J. Brennan spoke to the Class of 1987 at their May Hooding ceremony. Justice Antonin Scalia judged the final round of the First-Year Moot Court Competition in March 1989, and Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., received the first Ohio State Law Award from the Henry Folsom Page Society in May 1990.

Student Bar Association President Jessica K. Shimberg, LIII, gave the welcoming address. "Ohio State law students have been very fortunate in recent years to have the opportunity to meet with several United States Supreme Court Justices....[I]t is comforting to see that you are flesh and blood just like the rest of us. That way when we read a particularly puzzling opinion we can rest easy that it was not your intention to stump us, but rather it was your intention to give our professors excellent material with which to stimulate our minds and teach us how to think like lawyer[s]. Thank you so much for being here." The following are excerpts of the remarks which followed.

Justice Kennedy speaks to undergraduates at Weigel Hall on October 22. He visited the College of Law the next day.

The Study of Law

"I hope you recognize that this is a time, despite the pressures of your studies and perhaps even outside employment, that you do have more time now to reflect on the fundamentals and the principles of the law and of the human society and of the juridical system than you will ever have—unless perhaps you are a clerk or a judge, but even then you are going to find that you are very, very hard pressed for time.

"I enjoyed teaching law school very much....I believe that the law schools should be a training ground for a rather rigorous analytic discipline.

"I am somewhat concerned about the direction of our profession. We are becoming a very mercantile world out there. I do not want to see us divided into just two halves—those with a commitment to civic responsibility motivated by altruism and those that are simply trying to use the profession for their own personal enrichment. And we must begin addressing very frankly the problems: in some respects over-compensation, and in some respects the excessive costs of litigation.

"I am concerned about the concept of the profession that lawyers themselves have. The law is a great and noble and ethical calling, and I hope you have the opportunity, while you are here in law school, to learn to understand and explore (1) why that is, (2) why that should be, and (3) how that can be preserved.

"You do that in part by the interaction with your colleagues. I hope you participate frequently in class. I never could understand some students who were afraid to participate in discussion until they graduated and got in the courtroom. I never understood that. But that is why you are here. You begin to learn the parameters of fair debate; you learn the art of intelligent and persuasive discourse and discussion; you learn respect for your colleagues' views. All of this can be taught and should be taught in the classroom by a fairly rigorous academic method.

The Language of Law

"In any event, I hope that you make the most of your wonderful law school experience....[W]e have a really remarkable resource in this country of ours, and that is the national language of the law. You speak a common language of the law, and you have it in common with every attorney who is practicing, with every law student who is now in law school; and you will find, if you have not found it out already, that when you are in practice, you will pick up the telephone and talk to an attorney half a continent away whom you have never met, and you [will] have something in common with him or her. You have the common language of the law based on a common heritage, shared ethical traditions, shared aspirations. It is a very, very vital language for this country. It is a very, very vital national asset. And it makes for stability and productivity in this society.

"...[T]he American business lawyer can feel very, very proud of what our profession has built in this country. Business lawyers were as important to the industrial revolution in this country as the engineers were. They were the ones who developed the sophisticated forms of aggregating masses of wealth that were necessary to fuel this industrial system. It is a great creative achievement, and lawyers can be very proud of the fact that they are lawyers even if they are not in the courtroom exercising the kind of rhetorical skills that the lay person so often associates with excellence in the law.

The Supreme Court

"We have, I was surprised to find, over 100,000 people a year see at least a part of an oral argument. There is a line in the back a little bit out of my vision range which they call the four-minute line or the five-minute line, and people who just want to see what the court looks like and hear the justices talk and ask questions can come in for just a brief period, and that is enough for many who haven't studied the case or know the technicalities that are being discussed. Then, of course, we have the bar who can watch the case for the full hour if they choose.

"I think sometimes even astute court watchers are not conscious of the rich texture, the rich dynamic, the rich dimension of an oral argument. To some people it might seem that the conversation between the justice and the attorney is just a two-way dialogue, but of course it isn't. Basically what you are listening to is a conversation among the justices through the medium of the attorney. Questions are very important, especially if you are one of the junior justices on the court. This is the time that you have to signal that you have a reservation about the case, that you have a particular perspective on the case, that you have a particular suggestion for the case, because you talk last in conference, or nearly last, and you want to make sure that your colleagues are aware of this dimension of the case. You alert your colleagues to this through counsel; and skilled counsel that knows this can use this to their maximum advantage.

"[Oral argument] does make a difference. And there is nothing wrong with a profession in which after you have identified the principle you make a rhetorical case for its adoption. That is what the law is all about.

"The law has some poetry and some persuasion and some rhetoric and some force and some beauty to it, and there is nothing wrong with recognizing that at oral argument. There's nothing wrong with using a persuasive technique to direct the justices of the Supreme Court to a result that favors your client.... I can attest for you that not an oral argument goes by that one justice at least doesn't make up his mind at the bench, and more often the justice will change his mind. This is a very real process. Our work load is such that we have only an hour for oral argument, and we use that time to make up our minds. So it is a very true and a very real and a very rich process.

"I have to tell you that I am disappointed in some of the oral advocacy. There is almost a rule that the quality of the oral argument has an inverse proportion to the public interest in the case. We will go in and, 'Oh, this is a tax case or a copyright case. This is going to be a boring afternoon.' And then we have wonderful attorneys. Then we will have some of the great public issues, and counsel will be so self-conscious (their clients will be in the room) that sometimes the oral argument does not really help us that much, and we need help. There is no question about it.

These are cases which are on the razor's edge.

"I think we are not always quite as kind to counsel as we should be because we show our irritation with their lack of preparedness, with the argument, with their lack of the real ability to understand how to help us. We have to write an opinion. We want to see how it sounds; we don't want to hear about the easy parts of the case, we want to hear about the hard parts of the case. And of course sometimes I guess we look intimidating sitting up there, Supreme Court and all that sort of thing.

"But we hear, as you know, 24 cases a month for seven months. And they are very difficult cases. When I was on the circuit, I would spend a lot of my time first formulating what I thought the issue should be in the case because it was a first level of appeal, and I thought the issue should remotely resemble what the trial judge thought they heard.

"Then I would worry about the law. I would tell my clerks, 'You haven't found the law; there's a lot more law.' And they would come back and say, 'Oh, there's no law.' So I would go and try to do it myself and couldn't find it.

"And I would worry that I didn't find all the law in the Ninth Circuit, which is hard enough to understand, or the other circuits or the Supreme Court. I always worried that I had missed something. But only after I had the issue formulated and the law found could I proceed to write the opinion of the case.

"On the Supreme Court, the first two steps are done for you. The issue is very well-refined; it has been canvassed thoroughly by various different courts below; it has been refined on cert. The law has been well researched—the briefs are good, and our clerks are very adept at finding any other little authorities that we might need. So the case is presented for decision very quickly, and all you have to do is to make up your mind. And for that, of course, you have to rely ultimately on your own understanding of the law, your own principles, your own theory of the Constitution, and your own conscience."

Hoeffel Wins NAPIL Award

Last summer the Student Funded Fellowship (SFF) awarded a fellowship to then first-year law student Sue Strimbu Hoeffel, who took the opportunity to work for the Columbus Bar Association Homeless Project (Project). Her work with the Project earned her an award at the Second Annual National Association of Public Interest Lawyers (NAPIL) banquet held on October 20 in Washington, DC.

Hoeffel worked on the Project, which serves homeless persons in Columbus who have received or are presently receiving aid from one of the city's homeless shelters with the goal of providing the homeless population increased access to the legal system.

She has continued to work with the Project during this school year and she plans to work there again next summer. As the only full-time staff person last summer, she became extensively involved in all phases of the Project. "The best thing about my experience last summer was the personal contact with the clients. The summer was a clear affirmation that public interest law is what I want to do after graduation," Hoeffel observed.

She helped administer a continuing legal education course regarding legal assistance for the homeless, visited all of the Columbus homeless shelters, expanded the Project to accommodate all of the city's shelters, conducted interviews in the shelters, and communicated extensively with volunteers, shelters, and directors. Since she became involved, the number of volunteers increased from 70 to 120 attorneys and the Project expanded from visiting two shelters to five on a weekly or biweekly basis. She also organized a task force project through which shelters not being regularly visited can contact "on call" volunteer attorneys.

"I would like to thank all of the attorneys who encouraged me through their commitment to public service to pursue a career in public interest law," Hoeffel remarked.

The Columbus Bar Association Homeless Project was conceived in 1988 with its first training session for volunteer attorneys in 1989 and the second in 1990. The attorney volunteers go into nearly all of the shelters in Columbus, regardless of their affiliation, and conduct client interviews. Attorneys now average between four and eight interviews per shelter per week, depending on the season. Once an attorney has made an initial determination as to the type of help required, three responses are typically available:

a. "Yes, you have a legal problem, and I can handle it for you." Some volunteers have even been willing to perform nonlegal as well as legal tasks just to help the clients get back on their feet; or

b. "Yes, you have a legal problem, but I cannot deal with it myself." An extensive referral network is then utilized to help the client find appropriate counsel; or

c. "I am sorry, but you do not have a problem the legal system can redress."

Of those clients referred, roughly 50 percent actually go to the attorney referred, and 90 percent of those have their legal problems addressed.

The Second Annual NAPIL Awards were presented to three summer and/or community projects funded by a member program (such as SFF) in 1989-1990. The projects were judged on the following criteria: the success of the project in serving a traditionally underrepresented group or cause; the use of an innovative approach or model; the demonstrable impact of the project; and the likelihood that the project's benefit will continue. In addition to these criteria, NAPIL also considers minority representation, geographical location, and type of legal organization to ensure a diversity.

The other two winners were from the law schools at William & Mary and the University of California-Davis. Other NAPIL members include organizations similar to SFF at Michigan, Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Stanford, Cornell, and Duke law schools.

Ohio State Tops Bar Exam

Graduates of The Ohio State University College of Law continued to pass the July Ohio bar examination in record numbers, despite a general decline of 23 points in the statewide pass rate. Overall, only 65 percent of the applicants passed the July bar exam as compared to 88 percent the previous year.

While the College's overall pass rate of nearly 88 percent showed a decline of about 7 points from the July 1989 test results, Ohio State topped all other Ohio law schools by a wide margin. The next closest school was the University of Cincinnati with a pass rate of 78 percent—almost 10 points lower than Ohio State's performance.

In the Spotlight

George V. Voinovich '61 Elected Governor of Ohio

Hon. George V. Voinovich, 65th Governor of the State of Ohio

On January 14, 1991, on the front steps of the Ohio Statehouse, George V. Voinovich's law school dream became a reality as he was sworn in as the 65th Governor of the State of Ohio. "George never came to law school to be a practicing lawyer, but to prepare for public service. He told me in law school that it was his goal to be governor of the state. I never doubted for a moment that he would realize that ambition," stated Michael F. Colley, law school classmate of Governor Voinovich and chair of the Franklin County Republican Party.

The trip to the top of the state's political ladder has not changed the character of the man now set to lead Ohio. "Over the years, with all of his political successes, George has remained a down-to-earth kind of guy," observed another law school classmate, Clifford R. Cloud, who chaired the Voinovich Franklin County Campaign Committee. "I believe he has a clear sense of what he wants to do as governor, and I think he will do a great job in that office," predicted Cloud.

George V. Voinovich becomes the third graduate of The Ohio State University College of Law to occupy the governor's office. He follows in the footsteps of John W. Bricker '20 and C. William O'Neill '42, who served in that office from 1939-1945 and 1957-1959, respectively. Like his law school predecessors, George Voinovich comes to the governorship with extraordinary achievements and preparation for his new leadership role.

He brings a rich background in local politics. He served as Cuyahoga County Auditor (1967-71), Cuyahoga County Commissioner (1971-76), and Mayor of Cleveland (1979-89). He was elected mayor in three elections, receiving over 76% of the vote in 1979 and over 72% of the vote in 1985. He enjoyed the longest tenure as mayor in the history of the City of Cleveland.

During his service as mayor, he earned national recognition for his outstanding management of a major city and his commitment to public service. He also was Trustee of the United States Conference of Mayors, and President of the National League of Cities in 1985.

As George Voinovich moves his residence to Columbus, he is no newcomer to the Statehouse or to state politics. He began his political career as an Assistant Attorney General in 1963, and served as a member of the Ohio House of Representatives for five years (1967-71). In 1978, he was elected Lieutenant Governor on the ticket with Governor James A. Rhodes.

Governor Voinovich has devoted his professional life to improving government service and striving to meet the needs of others. "George has remained that same straightforward, honest, hardworking guy he was in law school," said Colley. "The only differences now are his experience and the contributions he has made in his political career."

The College of Law is proud of the achievements of George Voinovich and what his commitment to public service represents to this institution, to its graduates, and to its students. Perhaps today there is another ambitious young law student who has visions of special service to his or her state and country. George Voinovich is a reminder to all that hard work, integrity, and dedication can sustain achievement. Congratulations, Governor Voinovich. Our best wishes to you as you continue your successful leadership on behalf of the citizens of Ohio.

Alumni Gather For Reunions

The activities of the fall of 1990 would not have been complete without the hubbub of planning for the many class reunions of College of Law graduates. Eight classes held reunions on three different OSU football weekends.

September 8

Hilton Inn North was the site for the Class of 1985 reunion. Twenty classmates and their guests were in attendance, and all enjoyed sharing memories and trading 'war stories' about life since graduation. Those who traveled to Columbus from outside of Ohio included Victor L. Bland, Portage, MI; Joseph O. Bull, Raleigh, NC; Timothy E. Eagle, Grand Rapids, MI; Deborah A. Hammitt, Pittsburgh, PA; and Susan A. Kovach, Detroit, MI.

October 6

The weekend of October 5-6 was the College of Law's Annual Alumni Return weekend. In addition to the October 5 dinner honoring Distinguished Alumnus and Professor Emeritus Robert J. Lynn '49 (see related story on page 7), the October 6 Groundbreaking Ceremony (see related story on page 3) and football game against Illinois, five classes held their reunions on the evening of Saturday, October 6. The series of events made for a busy weekend, but all of the participants appeared to enjoy themselves thoroughly.

The Class of 1940 met for their 50th at The Great Southern Hotel. Columbus residents Charles E. Connor, Charles V. Schwenker, and Robert E. Teaford served as class coordinators. They were joined for the evening by nine other classmates and guests, including Philip Aultman, Xenia, OH; Fred W. Crow, Jr., Syracuse, OH; John W. Hardwick, Silver Spring, MD; Hon. James P. Horn, Elyria, OH; Joseph M. Horwitz, Cleveland, OH; Hon. John J. Lynch, Youngstown, OH; Edwin R. Oglesby, Farmington Hills, MI; Hon. Robert G. Tague, New Lexington, OH, and John L. Woodard, Dover, OH.

After dinner, Dean Beytagh awarded each of the reunioners a special 50-year certificate congratulating them on their lifelong contributions to the legal profession.

The cocktail hour was shared with the members of the Class of 1950, who also held their reunion dinner at The Great Southern Hotel. Spearheaded by class coordinators Jack R. Alton, Raymond P. Cunningham, Jr., Lloyd E. Fisher, Jr., (class representative) and Nils P. Johnson, the evening was highlighted by a visit from a special guest, Dean Emeritus Frank R. Strong. A poster of the 1950 class composite also helped put everyone in good spirits.

Twenty-five alumni attended the evening's festivities. The honors for the classmate who traveled the farthest distance went to William L. Johncox, who came in for the weekend from Potomac, MD.

The Class of 1960 gathered for an evening of fun and memories at Hilton Inn North. Under the guidance of class coordinator Gary T. Robison, alumni enjoyed a wonderful evening rekindling old friendships and making some new ties. Together with 15 classmates from around the Buckeye State, James C. Demas returned from Arlington, VA, and Charles D. George headed north from Clearwater, FL.

John F. Casey, class representative, organized the 25-year reunion of the Class of 1965. Held at Scioto Country Club, the evening was a resounding success. Dinner and dancing were enjoyed by 35 alumni and guests, one of whom came from outside of Ohio; James A. McLaughlin traveled to Columbus from Morgantown, WV.

The Class of 1980 held their reception together with the Class of 1960 at Hilton Inn North. Jeffrey L. Hayman, class representative, planned the dinner, held in a separate dining room for the 1980 graduates. Nearly 50 classmates and guests gathered to see old friends and catch up on ten years of 'news.'

Several members of the class arrived from out-of-state in time for the festivities. Cheryl L. Connelly came from Huntington, WV; Thomas P. Dickerson, Washington, DC; Laurene H. Horiszny, Troy, MI; Shirley Schwartz Kloczek, Jacksonville, FL; Norman J. Nadorff, Plano, TX; and David A. Wormser, Washington, DC.

October 27

The Class of 1955, headed by class representative David J. Young, held their reunion at The Great Southern Hotel as well. Over 40 alumni and guests celebrated their 35th over cocktails and dinner. Among those in attendance were Rodney A. Baker, Coulterville, CA, Kenneth R. Callahan, Detroit, MI, Charles E. Carmody, Utica, MI, and Robert L. Hill, Hartford, CT.

The Class of 1970 completed the autumn merrymaking with the celebration of their 20-year reunion, due to the organizational efforts of James A. Readey, class representative, and Charles C. Warner. After a pre-game box lunch at the College of Law, many classmates made the trek to Ohio Stadium to watch the Buckeyes take on Minnesota.

Later that evening, the Class of 1970 reconvened at The Great Southern Hotel for a special evening dinner. Many loyal alumni made the trip to Columbus, including Karen Holcomb Cloherty, Rockford, MI; Gary P. Gormin, Clearwater, FL; and G. Jeffrey Knepper, Washington, DC.

*Class of 1955 members
James Fitch, Lloyd Brown, and David Young have a
